WHICH OF THESE SUPERB BOOKS DO YOU PREFER?

A Crowning Success

DESPITE the overwhelming success that has everywhere greeted the Inside Story of the White House we are not surprised, for we knew its sterling worth before we put so much time and money into its publication. But while we have sung its praises ever so loudly in previous issues, we are told that we have not said half enough of the superb illustrations. So we unhesitatingly say now that these exquisite sepia half-tones are worth more than double our price for the volume. Could we pick out from the countless flattering letters received about this book all the superlative adjectives employed, we would certainly have a most imposing column of gratifying comments. As one reader writes us: "This story is so entertaining at the very outset and at the end and in the middle that whichever chapter one reads last seems the best." The volume is handsomely bound in rich green cloth stamped with gold lettering, and an entire chapter is devoted to the incoming Presidential family, with popular portraits of all the members.

Popular Everywhere

EVERYWHERE it has gone, World-Famed Stories and Legends has made as great a hit with the grown-up members of the family as with the young folks. Hamilton W. Mabie has that rare gift of telling a story in a way that holds his every listener from the nursery tots to the grandparents, and before the second edition is exhausted we most heartily recommend this unique volume to every Christian Herald family.

Beyond the Veil

NO book that we have ever published has proved more comforting and inspiring to thousands of our readers than this masterpiece on the life beyond. Dr. Peters, in this his magnum opus (great work), After Death—What? has seemed to divine the very questions that most perplex and trouble our hearts, and his inspired pen, guided by the clear light of reason, and illumined by words of wisdom and comfort from the poets and philosophers of all ages, writes for us a wonderfully lucid and beautiful answer to that greatest of all questions, that sooner or later comes to all: "After Death—What?"

Already we have printed a second large edition of many thousands of this uplifting book, and still we are receiving hundreds upon hundreds of orders, while countless letters from recipients in all parts of the country daily pour in upon us, speaking in glowing terms of this superb premium. Beautifully bound in a most delicate shade of violet, with lettering in genuine gold, the volume is particularly beautiful as well as invaluable for its rich contents.

WILL REFORM IN CHINA CONTINUE?

WILL reform in Chi Will the death of Kwang Su press Dowager, and the acces hild, Pu Yi, with Prince Chun as Rege retard the reform movement, and on g the Conservative party to the fro

To the first of these ques me by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I answe tic yes. Reform in China has proceede extent that it is not possible to find an empire who is so conservative as to wa hina back in the condition in which she Kwang Su began his reforms, in 1898 greatest reforms have taken place duri seven years, since 1901. Before 1900, n railroad entered Peking, the capital ire, though one came within three mile te most distant from the palace. All d lime used in the city had to be brou he backs of camels, mules or donkeys. N roads enter the city, the stations a beside the gate nearest the palac hese railroads connects Pek rm Petersburg, another with the east of Peking, another wit mer ines of the mountains west ford ital, another is a trunk lin iste ugh the centre of the empir Peking with Canton, and ist eads through a tunnel under cu Wall of China, for a direct rope. The constructing engine st is a young Chinese, educat ited States, while the capital con- struction is all furnished hinese themselves.

Reform will continue, has ceased to be "reform," come "progress." The old re y of the time of Kwang Su Yu-wei may be said to be ex e old Conservative party of the is dead, and there has ari y of "Progressives," made up test and most powerful offici st half century. These w ng-chang and Liu K'un-yi d), Chang Chih-tung Wang and Yuan Shih-k'ai (Chinese) ce Ching, Na T'ung, and Pu un (Manchu), all in Peking, rs and advisers of the pre nt. These are the men who h the Empress Dowager (perha g atest statesman of them all) to operation during the past in a statesmanlike way, all ms that Kwang Su and his ho nd brilliant, but radical and u n-like adviser, K'ang Yu-wei, attempted to force upon the Chinese people in as many weeks. What an opportunity came to K'ang Yu-wei when he was called to assist Kwang Su in the reform of China! But he lost it because he was not large enough, nor statesman enough, to grapple with the situation.

Prince Chun is the younger brother of Kwang Su. About thirty years of age, he is the son of Prince Ch'un—the seventh son of Tao Kuang. He is a little man, neither radical nor conservative. Mr. E. T. Williams, for many years the Chinese Secretary of the American Legation in Peking, now American consul at Tientsin, and who knows these Chinese statesmen and princes better, perhaps, than any other American, told me several years ago, in a conversation in the American Legation in Peking, that he "considered Prince Chun one of the brightest and strongest of all the younger Manchu Princes." Without question, he will keep Chang Chih-tung and Yuan Shih-k'ai in power and will undoubtedly continue the policy which was instituted by his brother, spoiled by K'ang Yu-wei, and carried on by his aunt, the Empress Dowager, and her great statesmen; for it was she who selected him and his son as Regent and Emperor to succeed her in preserving the Manchu dynasty.

It is impossible to say much about the baby Emperor. Oliver Wendell Holmes says, "If you want to make a good man, begin with his grandfather." If there is anything in that statement Pu Yi ought to be as good as can be found China. On his father's side seven of his ancestors have been Emperors, and on his mother's side—and my wife tells me that his mother is a beautiful little woman—his grandfather was the great, conservative Manchu statesman, and friend of the Empress Dowager, Jung Lu. His grandfathers, Prince Ch'un and Jung Lu, are both dead.

Many reports have gone out Ye-ho-na-la which have been ing. She is the niece of t Dowager, the daughter of Duke Kuei. She and h always lived on intim terms, in spite of the fa dethroned her husband has been in the palace sions, has been present talked with her in her ow and tells me that "she is a gea woman, but without any force acter," and this is probably so little is known of her. Jen Prince Chun are cousins, t mother being a sister of that father, and it would not be pr to say that there is little dan there being any difference of policy tween them, if indeed Ye-ho-na-la takes any part in political affairs at all, which I very much doubt.

One of the pet schemes of the late Empress Dowager, in addition to carrying out all the reforms instituted by Kwang Su, was the granting of a constitution to her people. To this end, a few years ago, she appointed a Commission, headed by Duke Tse (who is, by the way, Ye-ho-na-la's brother-in-law, being married to her sister), and sent them around the world to visit the great nations and report as to the best form of government. A SERMON BY

Rev. Dr. John Wesley Hill*

PATIENCE does not appeal to us as a regal quality. Why should a king wait? Having power to accomplish at once, why should he bear with the dulness and obdurateness of his subjects? Commanding swift agencies, why should he delay their execution? And right here we encounter a seeming contradiction; our text introduces a divine interpretation. It teaches that kingship is not divorced from patience, but bound up with it; that the divine kingdom is inherited through patience; and that spiritual sovereignty is acquired not by a single bound, but through the long, plodding pilgrimage which patience alone can make. This is a truth which permeates the entire spiritual economy, finding its supreme exemplification in the being and nature of God.

Christianity is solitary in its revelation of patience as a quality of God. No pagan god was ever crowned with this virtue. The coarse mind of man never evolved a gentle deity. The gods of human genius are great in impatience, force, and resentment. This conception of impatience as the prerogative of deity is not only at the root of the grotesque forms of paganism, but it is responsible for many of the false and monstrous views of God that have found their way into the so-called "Christian theology." When theologians paint pictures of God that stamp him with remorseless absolutism; when they say that God must be just and may be merciful, and set themselves to parceling out the divine nature into sections, tracing the boundary lines with mathematical precision, and then setting watches upon the frontiers lest love should encroach upon truth and mercy supplant justice; then they forget that all the great moral qualities are duly proportioned in the divine nature; that they include each other in a way that defies triangulation; and that patience is the guardian of them all.

The Divine Patience

When the sculptor's vision dis-ses the angel in the block, he is ot discouraged by hardness in the stone nor defect in the grain. He is bent on actualizing his ideal. The greater the difficulties, the more his patience is called into play. And dare we think of God as conceiving a purpose less sh-rdly, or bringing it to perfec- with less patience?

But meanwhile, God waits. He stands midst of the passing centuries with outhands of entreaty. No other attitude consonant with his character. Self-exis- r eternal, without beginning or ending, he bears account of time. Time is an element s not enter into his being. Perfection is d in which the divine ideals are cast; the f time is nothing. It is not a question of but of character. The problem reduces rfection. That is the infinite goal toward things in the universe, seen and unseen, , slowly, and patiently moving—the goal ed, perfected and glorified humanity.

Time, Providence and Calvary are the forces that conquer the soul, and therefore God waits to give them a chance, waits for us to weary of our rebellion, waits for the fever of sin to cool, waits for the black flood of passion to run out, waits with infinite patience for us to return, demanding no more than obedience, and asking only the homage of our hearts; and then he embraces us in the rapture of long delayed reconciliation.

The Joy of Tribulation

Standing thus before Calvary, and gazing into the tranquil face of Jesus Christ, we begin to realize what is meant by the patience of Jesus Christ. His patience meant infinitely more than the popular conception of patience: more than the power of physical endurance, more than drifting and dreaming in silence. The patience of Jesus Christ is a constructive force: it inspires a desperate, persistent struggle for spiritual manhood. It is a power which makes a kingly man and not a stoical petrifaction, insensible to "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune."

Now, there can be no kingship in the absence of patience. Protracted discipline is the condition of exalted character. It is thus that man wins himself from the wrecking forces of life; thus that he learns the truth and feels the power of Christ's immortal maxim, "In your patience ye shall possess (win) your souls." It was thus that John, the author of our text, won self-mastery. Think of it. The man who in the early stage of his Christian life desired that he and his brother James might sit on the right hand and on the left hand in the kingdom of Christ; the man of dignity and of ambition; the man who in his unbridled rage wanted to call fire down from heaven upon the inhospitable Samaritans; the man of pride and resentment; that man, chastened, subdued, and exalted, despised by the world, persecuted, exiled, and everything but martyred, sits down in the lonely solitude of that volcanic cinder called Patmos, and writes familiarly and lovingly about the "tribulation and kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ." What brought about the change? Patience was the stern and rugged schoolmaster that led him from pride and arrogance and self-assertion to the heights of a spiritual manhood sweet and tender and fraternal; a state of repose and vision enriched by the gain of loss, and filled with the joy of tribulation; a kingdom in which he became a partaker of suffering with every other sufferer, and could sign himself with kingly courtesy, "I, John, your brother in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ."

Not only does patience thus ennoble and exalt charac- but it imparts to life its only true and abi- pective. An art student once said to it in a moment." "Oh, you did!" re- master; "it took me twenty years to cannot stand before a work of art, inch, every color, every shad

CENTENNIAL OF AN ACTIVE CHURCH

ONE of the most famous Presbyterian churches in America—the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, of New York City—has just celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of its organization, and has set forward into its second century with renewed hope and zeal, kindled by a review of its successful past in Christian work. The church is very much alive spiritually, and besides drawing to itself a large congregation is reaching out into the byways and hedges, carrying its missionary efforts to several parts of the city, as well as making no small contribution to foreign fields.

The church was founded as a result of a difference of opinion as to whether Watts' Hymns should be sung in the Presbyterian Church, and also, in part, over difference in political views of some of the prominent members of the First Presbyterian Church, which worshiped in Wall Street, in the opening days of the nineteenth century.

Presbyterianism was well established in New York before the Revolution, though at first its adherents suffered much hardship and even persecution at the hands of the provincial government. The first Presbyterian clergyman who preached regularly in New York was the Rev. Mr. Francis McKemie, a Scotchman, who had previously established himself in the Colony of Virginia. He came to New York in 1707, and preached in a house on Pearl Street, owned by William Jackson. He baptized the child of his host, and this was probably the first Presbyterian baptism in the city. His presence was distasteful to the Church of England, and they caused his arrest, the governor, Lord Cornbury, taking part against him. After a short time he was released. For some time after this the Presbyterians carried on their services in their own homes, and without a pastor.

A reaction seems to have set in, and public sentiment became more favorable. A few years later we find the Presbyterians being allowed the use of the City Hall for their services. They organized as a church in 1717, and that parent body is now represented by the First Presbyterian Church on lower Fifth Avenue, between Eleventh and Twelfth Streets. The Presbyterians in New England, and in Scotland, full of sympathy for them, contributed the money to erect the first church, in Wall Street. Rev. James Anderson, of Scotland, was the first pastor. Branches of this church, the Beekman Street Church, built in 1768, and the Rutgers Street Church, erected in 1797, held their collegiate relationship with the parent body until 1809, when they became independent.

The singing of hymns, as well as of the Psalms, had been introduced into the Wall Street church, and a number of the congregation shook their heads sadly when they spoke of it, and thought a church should be started of the Presbyterian faith where hymns and the music of the organ should not be allowed; for, even at this late day, there were many, brought up in the simplest forms of worship, who still regarded an organ as "a kist of whistles." Political feeling was running high; the war of 1812 was only four years off, and the embargo laws and non-interference laws divided people who had been friends, and ranged church members on either the Federal or Democratic side. The discontented withdrew and built a church on Cedar Street, by subscription, the donors being later paid with interest. No organ was allowed, no hymns of Waats w sung, and during the service the street was ro off to prevent the rumble of passing carriages f disturbing the service. Later the church was mo to the corner of Church and Duane Streets. 1852, during the famous pastorate of Dr. James Alexander, the church erected a building on Fi Avenue, near Nineteenth Street. The next and l move was to its present site, at the corner of Fif fifth Street. The present structure shows the change which has come over the members since they first gathered in the simple edifice on Duane Street. The walls are of expensive woods and elaborately carved; the stained-glass windows flood the auditorium with a rich and subdued light.

The present pastor is Rev. J. Ross Stevenson, D.D., who succeeded the late Dr. John Hall. The pastor and committees arranged for services to be held for half of the anniversary week. At the Sunday morning service there was a special musical programme, a centennial hymn composed by Elder Henry W. Jessup being sung. The pastor preached from the text, "Hold fast the Word of God," and compared the Fifth Avenue Church with that of Philippi, which had a personal history, a growth, a self-conscious existence. "It has not been the church of any one class of society, but has aimed to be a fold of which it may be said, 'The rich and the poor meet together; the Lord is the Maker of them all.' The Bible has been the only text-book which our church has used down through its history. It is interesting to note in passing that soon after our church came into existence the need of a training school for ministers of the Word of God was felt, and as a result Princeton Theological Seminary was founded." He referred to its steady growth since it was first founded, with twenty-six members on the church roll. At the communion the new silver service, the centennial gift of Mrs. John P. Duncan, was used for the first time. In the past one hundred years the church has given to missions $7,598,885.98, and the members also raised a centennial offering of $10,000 for missions.

Temperance Progress During 1908

THE heralding of the gospel temperance message around the globe has been conducted with increasing earnestness and vigor by the World's W. C. T. U. during the year 1908. Seventeen gospel temperance missionaries have visited the mission stations abroad, have secured active co-operation in most places, and have been aided by the missionary boards and temperance workers in home churches.

The past year has seen this number increased by several gospel temperance evangelists. Miss Agnes Slack, the able secretary of the World's W. C. T. U., carried great inspiration and suggestion to India early in the year. Through her activities over 600 new members were enrolled in the W. C. T. U. of India; 15 new local W.C. T. Unions were formed; the first W. C. T. U. of Ceylon was organized; over 500 men were enrolled in other temperance societies and an organizing fund was inaugurated.

Miss Flora E. Strout, an efficient educator and trained temperance worker from Baltimore, Md., gave up her post as professor in a girls' college to carry the tidings of temperance to Japan. The petition of the W. C. T. U. for non-smoking cars on railroad trains in Japan has been granted by the government during the year.

Mrs. Tekla Julinder, Sweden — Mrs. Tae Ukai, Japan — Mrs. K. W. Sheppard, New Zealand — Miss Olabina Johannsdottir, Iceland

The great temperance victory in Switzerland has already been recorded in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Many public men in France are indorsing the temperance movement. Mlle. Julie d'Aubigné heads the new W. C. T. U. of Paris. Total abstinence sentiment is growing in Germany, where the "Students' Temperance League" is a strong and growing body. The Norwegian Parliament gave the W. C. T. U. an appropriation of $150, and the University of Christiania granted the use of Nobel Hall to the leaders for the annual W. C. T. U. Convention of Norway, in August. The Temperance Association of Swedish Teachers has nearly doubled its membership. It has now almost a thousand members in twenty-three local unions. Finland's prohibition law, enacted in 1907, still awaits the Czar's signature, but it is thought he will not veto it. Russian women have this year petitioned the Duma for local option and the abolition of liquor selling on steamboats and in railroad stations.

The White Ribboners of Cape Colony and the Transvaal have united with other women's societies this year. The Queensland W. C. T. U. is asking for a scientific temperance instruction law; the South Australian Union is establishing national W. C. T. U. headquarters, and New South Wales White Ribboners are urging the introduction of the Pollard pledge-parole for drunkenness; New Zealand temperance workers have been working hard in advance of the taking of the triennial vote on the liquor question.

The beginning of a revival of temperance sentiment is heralded in Canada. In British Columbia, the W. C. T. U. is leading a great campaign for local option. Temperance sentiment is strong throughout the Dominion.

studied carefully the form of government in Japan, were royally entertained at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York, were given all opportunities of understanding our form of government, and were guided and feasted throughout Europe. When they returned to Peking, the Duke Tse advised his aunt, the Empress Dowager, to give a constitution to the people—a constitution no doubt modeled largely after that of Japan.

The recent success of Japan is a great stimulant to the Chinese. Besides, the Japanese are Mongolians and think like, sympathize with, and treat the Chinese in a way better calculated to win their friendship and esteem than any Occidental people. Europeans and Americans are in too much of a hurry to take time to be polite. A Japanese always has time to bow and scrape—three times, if necessary, and it usually is necessary—and when he has finished his interview they both feel that "we are of one color, one blood and one opinion."

Furthermore, the Japanese and the Chinese read, if they do not speak, the same language, and this, perhaps more than racial affinity, will draw them together. When Chang Chih-tung wrote his epoch-making book, China's Only Hope, he advised that the Chinese take the books that had been translated into Japanese and put them into the Chinese language, and scatter them broadcast throughout the Empire, for in this way they would sow in the hearts of Chinese youth the same seed which had brought forth such a good harvest in Japan. "The Japanese," said he, "have ransacked the literature of all Europe, and have culled from it such as was useful to them in their reform measure. What served them will serve us. Why should we do over again what they have done so effectively?" This suggestion was taken up by a company of young Chinese reformers, a large printing house was established in Shanghai, and millions of volumes of books of what was called "the new learning" were given to the Chinese people.

Students then began to flock to Japan. The colleges and universities became crowded to overflowing. Temporary quarters had to be erected as dormitories, and the people had to open their homes and take them in. Private schools were opened—schools of all grades—and everyone who knew anything of English or the sciences of the West posed as a teacher. No pen picture can adequately set forth the hideous character of some of this teaching, and perhaps no English ear could understand their pronunciation of much of the English language.

It is not necessary to say that many of the most important positions in the Chinese colleges and universities are filled by Japanese professors—a much larger proportion than is filled by the people of any other nationality. In the universities at Peking, Tientsin, Pao-ting-fu, in the agricultural colleges, and in fact all over the empire Japanese are supplanting Europeans as teachers of the Chinese. They intermingle much more easily than Europeans can with the Chinese, and when they shave their head and wear a queue and Chinese clothing the Chinese themselves cannot distinguish them from their own people.

There is another feature of Japanese life in the Orient which is much more significant. In every school of any importance, where it is convenient for them to do so, they matriculate and enter as students. Some wear Chinese clothing, others European, but all study both English and Chinese, and have their ears and eyes open for everything of a social or political character that may be heard or seen.

The Japanese women are not less active than the men. It is a well-known fact that a few years ago the Chinese were not enthusiastice in the matter of female education. They were not opposed to it, but there was so much in Chinese light literature that was impure that they thought that purity without education was better than education without purity, and they feared that if their women learned to read they would befoul their minds with this light literature.

This condition, however, has all been changed in this reform movement. One of the ladies in Peking had an opportunity of explaining to the Empress Dowager the American system of common school education, and not long thereafter Her Majesty issued an edict approving of the establishment of girls' schools. The popular mind, however, had already been prepared for this edict. Girls had begun to study in their homes, and indeed in almost every well-bred family, according to the old régime, there was at least one woman who could read. There was, therefore, at the time of the sending forth of this edict a strong bias in favor of the education of women. Girls' schools had been established in connection with the various missions for years past, and the girls who graduated there were in great demand as teachers or as wives, so that I know it to be a fact that it was through the influence of these mission schools and missionaries that this sentiment was developed and this edict issued.

Girls' schools, therefore, began to be established throughout Peking, and indeed throughout the whole country, from Mongolia to Canton. I will describe one of them as typical of them all. The fifth sister of Prince Su—the man who gave his palace for the Christians in the siege—is married to a Mongolian Prince, Ka-la-chin, who is not a nomad. He has established a sort of village capital of his province or principality, the chief feature of which is his own palace. Here he lives during the summers and part of the winters; though once in three years he is compelled to spend at least three months in his palace in Peking, when he comes to do homage to the Emperor.

A Group of Young Chinese Students Amusing Themselves

It was during one of these visits to Peking that the Princess sent for Mrs. Headland to come to her palace. "I naturally supposed she was ill," said Mrs. Headland, "but her first greeting was: 'I am not ill, nor is any member of my family; but I wanted to see you to learn all I can about foreign countries, and especially about girls' schools.'

"She had prepared elaborate refreshments, and while we sat eating she asked me various questions about foreign governments, railroads, and mines, which indicated a wide range of intelligence and a deep interest in foreign affairs. But her interest centred on that particular day in the educational system of the West, and so I invited her to call, and promised to take her to visit our Girls' High School. This she did, and she then sent for a trained Japanese lady teacher, whom she took with her to her Mongolian home, where she established a school for Mongolian girls, an incident which shows how wide the influence of this reform movement has spread.

"In her school she has a regular system of rules, which do not tally with the undisciplined character of the Mongolians, and it was amusing to hear her tell how it was often necessary for the Prince to go about and wake up the girls, in order to get them into school at 9 o'clock.

"The next time she came to Peking she brought with her seventeen of her brightest girls, to see the sights of the city and visit some of the girls' schools, both Christian and non-Christian. On her return to Mongolia, she took with her a cultured young Chinese lady of unusual literary attainments to teach the Chinese classics. This lady was the daughter of the president of the Board of Rites, head examiner for literary degrees for all China, and was a chuang yuan, or graduate of the highest standing. Before going, this young lady had small bound feet; but she had not been long in Mongolia when she unbound her feet, dressed herself in suitable clothing, and went with the Princess and Japanese teacher for a horseback ride across the plains in the early morning, a thing which a Chinese lady is never known to do."

One of the greatest proofs, to my mind, that progress will continue seems almost too trivial for a place here. It is this: the whole mass of the Chinese people have begun to adorn themselves in foreign clothing. They began, just as they did in Japan, first with a foreign hat or a pair of foreign shoes, then with a vest outside their own coat—for the Chinese wears his vest outside his coat—then with trousers, then with coat and vest, and finally with the entire outfit. Then the students in the schools and universities began to come out in foreign uniforms. These uniforms in time were adopted by the professors. A day of sports was incorporated into the curriculum, together with class-day performances. Shops began to take on English, German or French, as well as Chinese, signs. In a word, reform and progress have gotten into the blood of the whole Chinese people, men, women and children, as well as the official class, and it would be as hard to stop it or try to turn it backward as it would to stop the flow of Niagara. Nay, more, I shall be very much surprised if the reform in China does not move much more rapidly than it ever did in Japan—more rapidly and with more force than it has ever moved in the history of the world; for consider the momentum of 400,000,000 of people. Then look out for a Mongolian alliance, similar to the Anglo-Saxon understanding of to-day.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—There is a movement on foot looking to the merging or union of the Welsh Presbyterian Church and the Dutch Reformed Church with the Presbyterian Church in the United States (frequently called the Presbyterian Church in the North). A meeting on the subject was held in Philadelphia recently, at which all three churches were represented. The Welsh Presbyterian Church has 15,000 communicants, and twenty presbyteries in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Wisconsin.

—Over eight hundred people were won to Christ in the month of November, during the Biederwolf meetings in Independence, Kas. Dr. Biederwolf is the director of the Forward Movement. All the churches united in the movement in Independence, and the meetings were conducted in an immense tabernacle, constructed at a cost of $1,500. The music was under the leadership of Homer Rodeheaver. On "Farmers' Day" hundreds drove in for the all-day services, bringing their lunches for the picnic dinner at noon in the tabernacle. On "Mothers' Day" nearly every person in the city wore a white flower, in honor and memory of mother.

—The recent death of the Empress Dowager of China has recalled the facts of her interest in the Bible. A well-informed missionary writes: "In 1895, the Empress Dowager, having received the gift of a New Testament from Christian women resident in China, set to work to read the volume, with the result that the Emperor wished to have a copy all to himself. Seeing that it was the New Testament, he also wanted an Old Testament. Next morning the palace eunuch hurried to the Bible Depot with an autograph memorandum from the Emperor himself, containing the words, 'Old Testament and one New Testament.' The unique order was signed, 'Father of Ten Thousand Years.' The order was executed, and the Emperor at once set to work to read the Bible."

—Miss Emma Wilson, principal of the Mayesville Training Institute for Colored Boys and Girls, writes: "Recently a poor sixteen-year-old girl came to us, without shoes or clothing; in fact, in the most pitiable condition. She said to me, the other day: 'Ef God spare me life to git a education, I will do all I kin to help de oder people roun' my home dat don't know nothin'. De Lord sent me to your school, an' I gwine to do all I kin to make myself somebody.' The girl is lame, and an orphan. Perhaps some generous reader of your journal may wish to help her in her laudable ambition to 'get a education.' "

—Bryce W. Ranken of the South American Evangelical Mission, at San Paulo, Brazil, writes: "A few evenings ago one of the new converts, Da. Antonia, approached us on entering with a parcel, saying she had something for us. We found it was a collection of the idols which had stood to her in place of God, and for which, since she had found him, she had no further use. How can we describe it to you? Three or four small images of the Virgin and other saints, one dressed as a cheap doll, in tinsel and pink; a small wooden cross on a stand, a collection of paper flowers and tinsel: and a few little oleograph pictures. Words fail to describe the pitifulness of it all." This woman's son was converted a few months ago.

CASTRO'S RULE OVERTHROWN

GOMEZ, VENEZUELA'S ACTING PRESIDENT, OUTLINES A POLICY OF CONCILIATION AND PROGRESS

LIGHT seems to be breaking in Venezuela, a vast region of South America, with an area nearly six times larger than the State of New York, and with a population little more than half that of the City of New York. For years Venezuela has been a scene of domestic strife and revolution, and of foreign antagonism aroused by the high-handed and tyrannical methods of the dictator, Castro, who has known no law but the dictates of his own will.

Ex-President Cipriano Castro

Venezuela is today the most backward of the sisterhood of South American republics. And yet it was the cradle of the great Bolivar, the scene of his trials and his triumphs, his sufferings and his victories, which resulted in the liberation of South America from the yoke of Spain. It was also the scene of one of the most extraordinary occurrences of the nineteenth century—the great earthquake of March 26, 1812—which destroyed twenty thousand lives, and was followed by a counter-revolution in favor of Spain, because the survivors of the catastrophe believed that it came as a punishment and warning for seeking separation from the Spanish monarchy. Thus the liberator of Venezuela had to fight not only the Spanish army, but also a far more terrible enemy—ignorance and superstition.

The independence of Venezuela seemed to be firmly established, and Bolivar and his fellow-patriots were preparing to carry the war into adjoining provinces when the earthquake laid Caracas and other places in ruins and destroyed many thousands of lives. The people were thronging into the churches at the time to celebrate the ceremonies of "Holy Thursday," and multitudes were crushed under the ruins of religious edifices. The clergy, who were friendly to Spain, and therefore hostile to the republic, proclaimed that the catastrophe, coming on the day and at the hour that it did, showed that God condemned the revolution. It was useless for the patriots to try to make headway against these appeals. The people went over in throngs to the Spanish side and soldiers deserted in regiments. The Spanish commander told his troops that they were instruments of heaven for putting an end to the impious revolution. Caracas and the republican army surrendered, and it seemed as if the torch of liberty was extinguished in that region of South America.

It was in this extremity that Bolivar proved himself another Washington. With a small band of followers, he kept up the struggle, from which weaker leaders had sought refuge in flight or surrender, and the people, who found themselves more oppressed by the Spaniards than ever before, forgot their superstitious fears and learned to regard Bolivar as a deliverer. Within a few months, he became master of Caracas and of nearly all of Venezuela.

But the Spaniards were not at the end of their nefarious resources. They excited a servile war, and organized a large army, composed almost entirely of liberated slaves. The warfare that followed was most inhuman. In a vast stretch of country, from the Orinoco River to Caracas, not a human being was spared who refused to join the Spanish cause. Bolivar fought desperately, but Caracas was taken by the enemy, and Venezuela again came under the Spanish dominion.

With the tenacity of Robert Bruce, Bolivar, after a brief self-exile, resumed the conflict. The Spaniards had been heavily reinforced from the mother country, with veteran troops, trained on European battlefields. To any chieftain less resolute than Bolivar, the patriot cause would have seemed hopeless. He did not hesitate to attack the foe, however, defeated them in several engagements, and rescued a considerable part of the country from their rule. The South Americans were taught by Bolivar that they could make headway against the trained soldiers of the Old World, and the recollection of that experience undoubtedly has had much to do with the defiant attitude of Venezuela's recent ruler toward the powers of Europe.

Venezuela has for many years been ruled by a succession of military dictators, of whom Cipriano Castro represented the extreme in absolutism, arrogance and indifference to the opinions and rights of the rest of the world. He is of mixed blood, but chiefly of Indian descent, and, like Juarez, Mejia and other noted Indians who have figured in Spanish-American history, he is of undoubted personal courage, and has never hesitated to take the lead in facing dangers which he invited others to encounter. He is one of a numerous family of brothers and sisters, and his father is still living, at a very advanced age. Several of Castro's brothers fought by his side in the decisive battle that put an end to a recent uprising against him.

Castro, until lately at least, has been popular. In fact, he has typified in his supremacy the triumph of the lowest element of the population, and this has been the mainstay of his power. The educated, better class has always chafed under his yoke, and the insurrections against him have been organized by that class, sometimes with assistance from abroad. Those of Castro's opponents who are in exile had headquarters in the Dutch island of Curaçao, near the northern coast of Venezuela, where they plotted revolutions and whence they carried on a campaign through the press in behalf of their cause. They came very near success in 1902, and were within a short distance of Caracas when Castro met them, at the head of his men, and plunged into the thick of the fight, coming out victorious after a hand-to-hand conflict in which thousands were slain.

Caracas, the Venezuelan Capital

Elected for six years in 1902, and re-elected in 1908, Castro has managed to get into trouble with most of the great powers, including the United States. This country has been content to await and watch, with its warships, the course of events, but not so England, Germany, Italy and Holland. The three former blockaded Venezuelan ports in 1902-3, and Germany bombarded the Venezuelan fort San Carlos, killing and injuring many of its defenders.

President Gomez

The object was to compel Venezuela to come to a settlement of debts due to subjects of those powers. The United States intervened and the claims were referred to the Hague Tribunal for examination and settlement, Venezuela agreeing to set apart a portion of the customs receipts for the payment of awards which the Tribunal should decide to make. This agreement is now being carried out. The recent difficulty with Holland consists in interference, on the part of President Castro, with commerce between the Dutch West Indies and the Venezuelan ports, and an alleged insult by Castro's government in its treatment of Holland's minister. The kernel of the trouble is, undoubtedly, Dutch resentment at Castro's interference with the Dutch trade.

Venezuela, on the other hand, had two grievances. One was that Dutch vessels did a vast amount of smuggling; the other, that Willemstad, the capital of Curaçao, has been a hotbed of plots and conspiracies against the Venezuelan government, and that conspirators there have been in favor with the Dutch local authorities. Venezuela having failed to come to terms within the time given by Holland, warships of the latter country have seized several Venezuelan coastguard vessels and taken them as prizes to Dutch West India ports.

Meantime, Castro himself has gone to Europe for medical treatment, and is in a sanitarium near Berlin. While political motives have been ascribed to this journey, there is strong reason for believing that Castro, owing to his personal habits, is in very bad physical condition, and that this is the chief, if not the sole, reason for seeking better medical aid than he could obtain in Caracas. He left in his place the Vice-President, J. Vincente Gomez, in whom he professed entire confidence. The immediate command of the military forces, however, was in the hands of Torres Cardenas, Castro's most devoted adherent. Cardenas conspired with others to assassinate Gomez, but the latter, being informed of the plot, went to the barracks, arrested Cardenas in the midst of his troops, and hurried him to prison. Gomez evidently believed that Castro was a party to the conspiracy, for he dismissed the Castro cabinet, caused the Bank of Venezuela to withdraw Castro's letters of credit to Paris and Berlin, and at once took steps to come to a peaceful arrangement with Holland. The future of Venezuela is, therefore, much improved since the nightmare of Castro's despotism has been lifted from that unhappy land, and nowhere is the change more welcome than in the United States, American citizens having been among the most conspicuous victims of Castro's injustice and oppression.

Our Old Age Pension Plan

SOMETHING over ten thousand applications have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for particulars regarding the old age pension plan lately proposed to our readers by Dr. Klopsch, the editor and proprietor of this paper.

This remarkable volume of correspondence is quite unprecedented, and is a convincing demonstration of the widespread interest our proposition has awakened. Everywhere we find people eager to learn the details of an economic plan which has for its object the lightening of the burdens which poverty so often inflicts upon old age. To open a way whereby any ordinarily intelligent and industrious man or woman may reasonably provide for the time when the physical capacity for work begins to fail, and to fill those years with comfort and a measure of independence, is one of the most meritorious problems of our day, yet one that is greatly neglected. In the general rush for wealth, we are apt to overlook those to whom the struggle for existence has become futile and hopeless, and who faint by the way.

Old age pensions are attracting attention in almost every civilized country except our own. In Germany and England, pension plans for the deserving aged are already in operation. Here, where this problem confronts us in every community, nothing has yet been accomplished. Our plan is a simple, yet entirely practical one, and to those who are willing to make the effort and to comply with the requirements, there is within reach a guaranteed provision for old age, which, while it will not make them rich, will afford a sufficiency for reasonable needs, and thus at least enable them to be independent of charity.

We invite all who are interested to write to us for full particulars. Applications for such literature, which will be ready for mailing February 15, 1909, should be addressed: Pension Plan, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Woman in the Far East

ALTHOUGH the Oriental woman has for centuries lived in seclusion and has had nothing in her environment to correspond with the conditions of woman in Western lands, it is doubtful whether the general impression of her as a nonentity is correct. The Rev. John P. Jones in his recent thoughtful and exhaustive work on India tells us that women in that ancient civilization and in such home life as exists there exert a strong and ceaseless influence. Rudyard Kipling's familiar lines,

> Oh, East is East, and West is West,
> And never the twain shall meet,
> Till earth and sky stand presently
> At God's great judgment seat, state in poetry what is the actual truth in prose. The East and the West are so utterly different that the one cannot understand the other. Notwithstanding this, a man's mother the world over holds him in an enduring spell, and a man's wife has her place at his side as adviser and helpmate even when he least acknowledges the fact.

The women of the East have consistently opposed Christianity, clinging to their idols with the whole force of their nature, and being less easily won from superstition and ignorance than the men. For this reason the hope of the foreign missionary must largely be placed in the schools to which the daughters of the East, the little girls of China, India and Japan, are allowed to go. Here they are taught the first principles of Christ's religion of love.

Strangely enough, a woman who has recently died in Pekin has wielded a stronger empire and exercised a more tyrannical despotism for more than forty years than has been possible to any contemporary woman in the world. Few women in history have equaled in force of character, masterful cruelty and tenacity of will the late Dowager Empress of China. Her parallels have appeared from time to time in such women as the famous Empress Catherine of Russia, and in the relentless Catherine de Medici, who dominated France with her duplicity and recklessness. The Chinese Empress held in her feminine grasp the destinies of a realm containing four hundred millions of people. Conservative, narrow, prejudiced and inflexible, she was a specimen of womanhood at its worst. Yet an artist who lived for months in her court and who painted her portrait, spoke of her as gentle, refined and possessed of a gift of humor. She will be remembered as the spirit behind the Boxer outbreak in 1900, and it is hardly too much to say that in her demise an obstacle is removed in the onward march of China. A woman's influence was sufficient to retard the progress of civilization in that vast empire. Here is another proof that there is essentially no sex in brain, and that woman is a quantity to be reckoned with whether her native land be under an Oriental or an Occidental sun.

The Boycott Case

WHAT seems destined to become a historic case reached its culmination on December 23, when Judge Wright, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, pronounced three of the best known labor leaders guilty of contempt of court, and sentenced them to imprisonment. The accused were Samuel Gompers, president of the Federation of Labor; Francis Morrison, secretary of that body, and John Mitchell, president of the Miners' Federation. Mr. Gompers was sentenced to a year in prison, Mr. Mitchell to nine months, and Mr. Morrison to six months.

This remarkable outcome was the climax of the now famous suit concerning the labor boycott of the Buck's Stove and Range Company. An injunction had been issued by the court against the labor unions, and the charge was made that the accused had counseled all members of the unions to disregard and violate the injunction. Judge Wright's opinion occupied two hours in delivery. He submitted a mass of documents bearing on the case to substantiate the charge of contempt. When he had concluded, Mr. Gompers spoke briefly, disavowing any purpose of breaking the law. He declared that the struggle was that of the working people for their rights, and announced his willingness to suffer vicariously in their behalf. His remarks were endorsed by his two associates, Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Morrison. Judge Wright then passed sentence, as already stated.

Unquestionably, the result was a surprise to the labor men, who had not anticipated it. A popular appeal has been made to President Roosevelt in their behalf, but intervention at this stage may be impracticable. The case will be taken before a higher court for review. Should this appeal result adversely, then it is probable that, either through Executive interposition or judicial clemency, the accused may be saved from actual imprisonment.

Important Treaties

EUROPE at present seems to have a rather pessimistic view of the nature of the treaties between nations, since the recent action of Austria and one or two other countries bordering on the Balkans. According to the British press, a great many statesmen seem doubtful as to whether, under the threat of war or some other great crisis, the treaty of the Triple Alliance and several others would have any more value than their weight of parchment in the public market. It is probable that this gloomy view of the good faith of nations may pass as soon as the situation improves in the near East.

On this side of the sea, the United States and Canada carry on their business with each other in a way that is highly encouraging for those who believe in the amicable adjustment of international relations, and the settlement of disputes between countries by arbitration on all questions save where the national honor of either country is involved. Although the official announcement has not yet been made, three treaties are practically agreed on. The first agreement will provide for the submission of the famous treaty of 1812 to the Hague Tribunal, to have it define the respective rights of the United States, Canada and Newfoundland in the Atlantic fisheries. The second treaty will determine all questions concerning the ownership of rivers which are common to the two countries, and also the use of Niagara Falls as water power. Over this there has been some friction, but tact on both sides has brought matters to a point where an early settlement may be looked for. A third treaty will arrange for a commission to settle all present standing pecuniary claims of both countries. This commission may be a permanent body, and, if given adequate authority, could settle most of the disputes arising from conflict of interests on the rivers, the St. Lawrence and others. It would do away with many of the present vexatious delays and red tape, which are so often the cause of trouble between neighboring countries, whereas a speedy settlement would leave little chance for irritation.

Canada and the United States have had unbroken peace for years, and the new treaties will undoubtedly remove any chance of having their cordial relations broken. As Vice-President Fairbanks said, at the Quebec ter-centennial, neither covets the territory of the other and each is interested in the growth and prosperity of her neighbor.

The Shepherd and the Sheep

IN the nomadic or pastoral state which still prevails in many parts of the world, almost every man is more or less of a shepherd. So much that relates to comfort and subsistence depend upon the welfare of the flocks that the calling of a herder, or sheepmaster, in such communities is by no means an unimportant one. The shepherd's life is still attended by hardship and danger. Amid storm and cold he has to protect his flock, to defend them from wild beasts, to guard them from pitfalls and precipices, to find fresh pasture for them by day, with good water, and to securely fold them at night, setting a watch over the fold till daybreak. In olden times, the staff and sling were the shepherd's defensive weapons, and in many places are so still. With these, and his warm sheepskin coat and his scrip or bag for food, he was fully equipped for duty.

David's "Shepherd Psalm" is a beautiful picture of the pastoral life, with its freedom from the harassing and corroding cares of the outer world and its perfect dependence upon God. David, who was himself a herdsman, in that song tells us how the Good Shepherd supplies every want of body, soul and spirit; how he gives to his sheep food for sustenance and water for refreshment, with perfect peace amid pleasant surroundings; how he cheers them and helps them to overcome temptation and to avoid danger, inspiring them with courage by his presence and his supporting touch; how he bears them up in affliction and spreads a rich feast for them, to all of which he adds the sweet assurance of his continuing love and care—his goodness and mercy—to the end.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Seattle and the Totem Pole

THE totem pole, among the Alaska Indians, is an expression of their affection and religion. It represents the character of their forefathers; and every sign, every carving, and every blended color upon it has a sacred meaning. The eagle carved upon a totem pole means that a son of Alaska has descended from a leader, one who migrates. The raven is one who is crafty and wise. The frog means a philosopher. The bear means power, muscle. The whale implies plenty of food. The duck suggests placidity, and an even temperament; the seal, beauty, grace, charm; the salmon, desires and ambitions. The deeds and ambitions of the forefathers are expressed in the figures on the totem pole. Some years ago a party of Seattle enthusiasts, on a voyage of discovery, made a trip to Southern Alaska. In a small Indian village they concluded to take home one of the totem poles that stood before a hut. From two old Indian women they purchased the pole, and, at a formal meeting, with much speech making, presented it to the city of Seattle. The city was so proud of the gift that it had it painted afresh, the better to bring out the remarkable characters upon it. Two Indian chiefs from the village, a little time after, full of revenge, came to Seattle, entered legal process and took the pole back with them, besides several thousand dollars in damages which they had recovered by their suit.

Man has been designated as a religious animal. The religious instinct is the deepest instinct in him. Given a nation's religion, its history can naturally be written as the result. Religious prejudices are the most deep-seated; religious wars are the most terrific. He who clashes with the religious opinions or prejudices of his fellowman is likely to get into trouble. Paul encountered this prejudice, and the silversmiths of Ephesus took advantage of it to incite a mob, because the preaching of the apostle had led to the destruction of the images of Diana. Demetrius told the mob that not only was the trade of idol-making in peril, but the people were being made to despise the great goddess Diana and to destroy the magnificence of her worship.

And when they heard these sayings, they were full of wrath, and cried out, saying, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. And the whole city was filled with confusion. (Acts 19:28, 29.)

Love's Light and Shadow

Of the many incidents of the recent holiday time there are two that present complete contrasts. One of the leading monarchs of Europe ordered, from a firm in London, perhaps the finest toy ever made. The toy is the complete model of a railway system. The train consists of an engine, baggage car, guard's van, and first, second and third-class cars. It starts from a perfect miniature country railroad station and travels over well-laid tracks through a beautiful country, over bridges, through tunnels, and along canals, on which boats are plying. The block signals are all in perfect play, so that no accident may occur. This was "Grandpa Bertie's" Christmas present to his little Norwegian grandson, Olaf. What wild joy the present brought to the palace and the boy!

For weeks Margaret O'Leary, of Chicago, aged four and a half years, had been denying herself and saving pennies to buy her father a Christmas present. A little before Christmas the father was killed at a railroad crossing, and little Maggie took the pennies and bought a simple wreath of flowers and put it on her father's coffin. Letters in the wreath, formed of flowers, spell these words: "Papa's Last Christmas Present."

What a sweet little story this is! In the two incidents we have the light and the shadow of love. Amidst the lights and shadows of earthly love there is the love of the blessed Saviour who comforts in sorrow, who inspires life's joys, who nestles to his bosom the little orphan who puts the wreath on her father's coffin, adds to the joy of the boy in the king's palace, and prepares his children for a world of unalloyed happiness beyond.

Verily, verily, I say unto you, That ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice: and ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy. (John 16 ; 20.)

To Hunt in the Interest of Science

Secretary Walcott, of the Smithsonian Institution, has made an official statement concerning President Roosevelt's African hunting trip, which he is to make with a select company, two weeks after his term of office shall have expired.

The statement says:

In March, 1909, Mr. Theodore Roosevelt will lead a scientific expedition to Africa, outfitted by the Smithsonian Institution, and starting from New York City. This expedition will gather natural history materials for the government collections to be deposited by the Smithsonian Institution in the new United States National Museum at Washington, D. C.

Besides the President and his son, Kermit Roosevelt, the personnel of the party on leaving New York will consist of three representatives of the Smithsonian Institution—Major Edgar A. Mearns, medical corps, United States Army, retired; Mr. Edmund Heller and Mr. J. Alden Loring. On arriving in Africa the party will be enlarged by the addition of Mr. R. J. Cuninghame, who is now in Africa preparing the President's outfit. He will have charge of the native porters, who, with necessary animals, will be formed into a small caravan.

Mr. Roosevelt and his son will kill big game, the skins and skeletons of which will be prepared and shipped to the United States by other members of the party. Mr. Kermit Roosevelt is to be the official photographer of the expedition.

The national collections are very deficient in natural history materials from the Dark Continent, and an effort will be made by the expedition to gather general collections in zoology and botany to supply some of its deficiencies, but the main effort will be to collect the large and vanishing African animals.

The expedition is expected to spend a year on African soil, reaching Khartoum about April, 1910. President Roosevelt is very fond of sport, and his son, who accompanies him, has inherited the same disposition. It is expected that they will have a very enjoyable trip, but the fact that the expedition is in the interest of science will add a deeper interest to the trip, which will be a permanent contribution to geographical and biological science. The President has always woven in the stories of his hunting trips fascinating description of mountain and river, of guides, dogs and animals, and the description of his trip in Africa will be greatly appreciated by the people of other lands as well as our own. It is to be hoped that no deadly fever will smite him and that no wild beast will harm him.

Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear. (I. Sam. 17 : 36.)

China, and the Millennium

Sir Robert Hart, who knows more about China than any living man, has expressed a prophecy as to the brilliant future of that great nation. The Chinese, he says, are a strangely reasonable people, but they hate the idea of having to become soldiers, and say: "If right is right, it ought to be recognized by everybody, and we ought not to be required to fight to support it." He holds, however, that the strong foreign competition, the improvement in the labor-saving appliances, and the means of communication and transport make it necessary for the nation to maintain a strong army.

Out of her four hundred millions, the nation could furnish a standing army which, if properly drilled, armed and equipped, could stand against the combined armies of the world. Sir Robert Hart looks into the future a century or two as a prophet, and beholds this mighty nation, with its untold millions and its enormous army, the exponent of the sanest reason and the arbiter of the world's peace, ushering in the millennium.

And they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruninghooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. (Isa. 2 : 4.)

Phonograph as a Witness

As a detector of crime, the phonograph came into prominence recently in Pittsburg, when C. A. Rumstay, through the testimony of a record, was held on a charge of assault and battery by Magistrate G. H. England. The information was made by John E. Hinds on behalf of his wife. In a dispute, Rumstay struck and knocked down Mrs. Hinds in her parlor. Her screams were faithfully recorded on the surface of a blank record which had been placed in the machine to reproduce a piano solo which Mrs. Rittenhouse, a friend, was playing. Mrs. Rittenhouse rushed to the assistance of her friend, and instead of the phonograph receiving the sound of the piano, which had stopped, it recorded the screams of the woman.

Science is more and more learning how to record the most delicate sounds or rays of light or currents of electricity, but they are all of them hints of the sensitiveness of our own mental and moral natures to outer impressions, and the fidelity of the revelation of the records of human conduct in the last day, which will be witnesses for or against us in the last great court.

For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil. (Eccles. 12 : 14.)

"High Artistic Merit"

Mr. Klopsch, Dear Friend: I have received the premiums, The Inside Story of the White House and the beautiful pictures from the Art Gallery De Luxe. The book is beautifully bound and is most interesting. I am pleased to possess it. The pictures possess artistic merit in a high degree, and if framed would adorn the walls of the most refined home. I thank you most heartily for your generous gifts. JOHN LEVERING.

CUTTING UP THE CULLINAN DIAMOND

THE great Cullinan diamond, the largest in the world, has been cut up into pieces. It was a delicate and wonderful operation. Readers of this journal will remember the photograph of the original diamond, in the rough, just as it was found in the Premier mine in South Africa. In its rough state, the Cullinan was irregular in shape and weighed 3,025¾ carats.

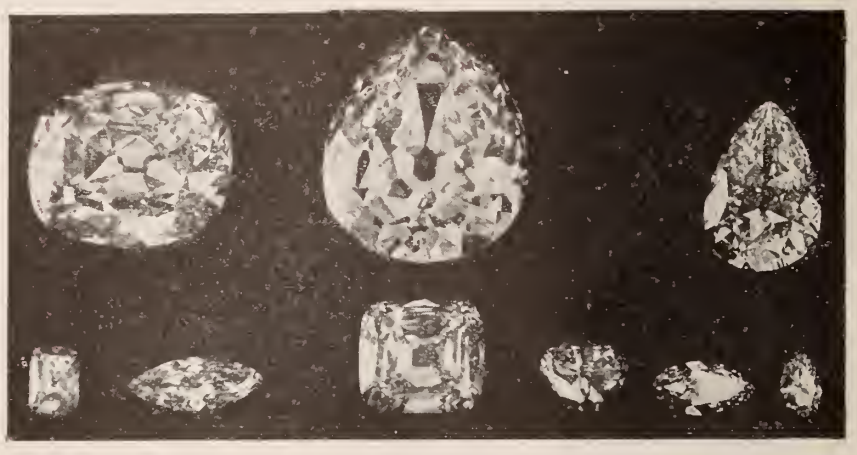
The first great problem to arise, when a huge diamond is found, is that of realizing money on it, for there are no individuals wealthy enough to care to possess such a one as the Excelsior, the Jubilee, or the Cullinan, and governments do not like the idea of investing capital in something that can yield no return. According to its actual weight in carats, the Cullinan was worth, in the rough, $2,210,000, but the fact that it was the only diamond of its size in the world made it worth much more. It could, of course, have been broken up into fragments of marketable size; but this would have entailed an enormous loss. Pending a decision as to its final disposition, the priceless crystal was forwarded to London, and for three years lay in the vaults of the Rough Syndicate. Then the government of the Transvaal conceived the idea of presenting it to Edward VII. of Great Britain upon the occasion of his sixty-sixth birthday, and this was done.

After the stone became the property of the British Crown, the question of polishing was taken up, for an uncut diamond is of no more beauty than a lump of camphor. It was turned over to the firm of J. Asscher, of Amsterdam and Paris, probably the largest diamond-cutting establishment in the world. The diamond was photographed in various positions, with the result that two important and several minor flaws were discovered, necessitating the cleaving of the stone into at least two and perhaps more sections. Joseph Asscher, a member of the firm, was selected to perform the important work of splitting up the stone. Finally, two incisions were made with a sawing machine along the grain, and to a depth of one-half to three-quarters of an inch. A specially made knife blade of finest steel was then inserted in the incisions, and with two blows with an iron rod the great diamond was split exactly along the grain and through the flaws.

This was, to say the least, a nerve-trying operation, for it sometimes happens that instead of splitting along the grain a diamond will fly into a number of pieces. Such a result in the case of the Cullinan would have been nothing short of a calamity. When the splitting had been accomplished, however, the result was such that it was apparent that there could be cut and polished two perfect stones larger than any ever dreamed of, the only further question being as to what would be the most advantageous shape to give them—pear, cushion, round or oblong. A special room was built, and the stones turned over to a man who by reason of this connection has become famous—Koe. For eight and a half months this man watched a mammoth disc revolving at a speed of 2,700 revolutions per minute, and putting the finishing touches on the world's greatest diamond. It is customary to give all diamonds fifty-eight facets, but in order to bring out the prismatic fires in the Cullinan seventy-six facets were given.



The Finished Cullinan (half size) and the Smaller Stones Cut from the Chips

Naturally, the transportation from place to place of an article that could be easily carried in the pocket, and yet which was worth a great fortune, was a matter for grave consideration. One would suppose that it would be surrounded by many armed guards; but such was not the case. In its passage from South Africa to London, it was sent in an ordinary registered mail pouch, no more precautions being taken to guard it than if it had been a book. It is true, however, that it was insured for $2,000,000. While in the hands of the diamond cutters, the stone was closely guarded. When it was finally carried to London, after cutting, it again went in an unostentatious manner, in a man's jacket pocket. An iron-banded casket, heavily guarded by armed detectives, which went at the same time, and which was supposed to contain the great diamond, was empty, a fact unknown even to the guards.

A HEROIC PIONEER OF HAWAII

Rev. Hiram Bingham at His Home in Honolulu

WITH the passing from earth of Rev. Hiram Bingham, the last week in October, a modest hero and missionary disappears from the field of his activities.

It was the privilege of the writer last February to have several interviews with Mr. Bingham, in his modest home in Honolulu. Most thrilling was the account of the early struggles of his father and the six families who had come around the Horn in a sailing vessel.

A whaler had brought to Massachusetts three Hawaiian boys, who were taken into Christian homes and educated. These boys accompanied this first mission.

They landed at Kealakekua Bay, the same place where Captain Cook had moored his ships, twenty-three years before. King Kamehameha I. had just died, and the "tabu" was in force. No landing was permitted for two or three weeks, and the seasick, storm-tossed passengers were compelled to remain on the ship. Desperate loafers, known as "beach-combers," warned the monarch against the new comers.

When they finally landed they were told that they might remain one year, with the understanding that they were to encourage no sedition.

A house had been constructed on a simple New England plan, and placed in the hold of the ship. But Kamehameha II. would not permit its erection, because his own dwelling was a grass hut.

The mission force divided, a part remaining on Hawaii, while the remainder went on two hundred and fifty miles north to Oahu, where they settled in the little village of straw huts built on either side of Nuuana Creek—the beginning of Honolulu. The place assigned to the missionaries for the erection of their straw huts was a desolate spot, without shade or water. But they lived there, doing successful work in gaining the confidence of the natives. When a year had elapsed they again approached the king, with a request to set up their house, saying that their women and children were ill. Permission was graciously granted, and sincere friendship was now shown by the king.

A substantial foundation was made for this house, a cellar was dug and three wells, but the water was brackish and could only be used for culinary purposes. The beach-combers said the cellar was for storing powder, and soon these missionaries noticed that the guns on the fort were pointed at the house.

It was in this house, seventy-seven years ago, that Hiram Bingham first saw the light. On that eventful day his father placed him in the arms of the Queen Regent, who called him "the little teacher."

He was educated at Yale. Here, besides a thorough literary and theological course, he studied navigation. When the second Morning Star was ready to sail from Boston, the American Board sought for a Christian captain. Hiram Bingham offered himself as this captain. The Board was at first incredulous as to his ability. The ship reached the islands after a voyage of several months.

About this time he was elected to be the pastor of the great native church in Honolulu. The reigning monarch made a most eloquent appeal for him to accept, recalling that early day when he in infancy was named their "little teacher." Attractive as the situation was, it was declined, and this soldier of Christ went, instead, to the benighted Gilbert Islands.

On an atoll, having a lagoon fifty miles in length, on land only half a mile in width, with no water that was not brackish, he commenced the translation of the Bible into a tongue which he created.

The poor food reduced Mr. Bingham to a skeleton. In this condition he was brought to Honolulu. A year later, he was sufficiently recovered to resume his work on the translations.

The Gilbert islanders, like the Hawaiians, are a dying race. It may be that the day will come when not a man can read the books prepared at such a cost of loving labor by Hiram Bingham. Yet we cannot doubt that many souls will be gathered among the blest of all nations as a tribute to the glory of God and the self-sacrificing labor of a great soul.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

George Hunter and Dudley Verner were college chums and are stopping at the country home of the former, before George is about to start practice as a lawyer and Dudley as a physician. George is introduced to Miss Danforth, daughter of Squire Danforth, who lives on the fine estate called "Paradise." Dudley is most anxious to meet her. A village character, Jack Green, takes them to see "Paradise." He says that they do not often receive company, but spend much time in travel. They there meet Miss Danforth at the well, and Dudley is introduced. A thunder storm comes up and the young men are invited to take shelter in the house, where they stay to dinner. As they leave, the Squire drives by on the way home. His daughter is surprised at his sudden return. She explains why the young men had been there. He says he is particular about his visitors, and asks her not to do more than recognize them hereafter. He says that he is going abroad and will take her and her aunt. They go to call on Mrs. Hunter and her niece Miss Sanborn. The squire discovers that Mrs. Hunter is an old friend. On his return he tell Aunt Phoebe a family secret which greatly agitates her, but which she cannot tell Miss Danforth. Marian stays up until early in the morning, when the aunt falls asleep. That day Mr. Hunter and Mr. Verner call to wish them a pleasant voyage. When they embark Miss Danforth finds in her stateroom a bouquet from Mr. Verner. Miss Danforth writes a letter to Miss Sanborn telling sea experiences.

CHAPTER VI

MARIAN'S letter was received with great rejoicing by Mrs. Hunter and her niece. It almost seemed as though the sea-breezes of which she wrote had touched the pale cheeks of the invalid, bringing to them color and health.

During George Hunter's first visit home, which was hastened by anxiety to hear news of the travelers, which Squire Danforth's assurance had led him to believe would be received at about this time, the letter was read and talked over many times.

Mrs. Hunter was somewhat reticent in speaking of her early friendship with Squire Danforth's family, and George was too true a son and too thorough a gentleman to show curiosity concerning matters over which his mother evidently wished to draw a veil. That the remembrance of the old friendship had given her a new zest in life, was very evident from the way in which she took part in the conversation, and discussed the letter, and from the interest with which she planned neighborly visits upon the return of the travelers.

When George returned to the metropolis, his friend Dudley inquired about the Squire's family, and drank in eagerly the account which his friend gave of the sea-voyage as described by Marian.

"I say, George," he exclaimed, "that old man disliked me, and for the life of me I cannot tell why. I would give a good deal to be on the terms of friendship with him which you enjoy. What can have prejudiced him against me, I wonder? I have never knowingly given him offense. You seem to be quite a favorite."

"There is no accounting for tastes, Dudley. I think he shows very little discernment in preferring me to you, I am sure."

The two young men continued to be firm friends. George had fortunately been taken into the law office of a friend of his father, and his prospects for success in the world were very fair.

Dudley had opened an office in a modest little house in a rather retired part of the city, swung his sign, "Dudley Verner, M.D.," to the view of passers-by, and, figuratively, sat down to wait for patients. Literally, he was not of the kind to sit down and quietly await their coming.

A dear lover of music, he sometimes whiled the leisure hours away with his violin, seeming in his despondent hours to voice through its strings his own misery; and again letting forth exultant strains like the cry of some glad conqueror.

In all their intercourse, further than that his father was a Spaniard and his mother had died in his infancy, Dudley never spoke of his family. One could see that in spite of all his gayety, there was a vein of sadness running through his daily life, and that he craved companionship. It was a pleasure to note his loyalty to his friend George Hunter.

Since their boyish intimacy had been formed years before at college, the two had been almost like brothers. George often dropped in to spend an evening with Dudley, and many times they went together to some place of public amusement.

"He sometimes whiled the leisure hours away with his violin"

It was evident that it was not for the money to be gained that young Verner had chosen his profession; for always at college, and during these later years, his lavish expenditures showed him to be possessed of wealth. Since making his home in the city, many a poor family had blessed the young man for assistance which he had quietly rendered.

One day they had been out for a stroll, and George proposed that they should drive out to Central Park.

The afternoon was one of the hottest in July, and the grateful shade of the trees under which they sat, the warble of birds overhead, the laughter of children as they gamboled here and there, all tended to put them into a happy mood.

Dudley's heart seemed to open, alike to the beauties of nature and to the friend who was daily becoming more and more dear to him.

He spoke more freely than ever before of his early life, his longing for the forever vanished joys of mother and home, and congratulated George upon the possession of both.

A startled cry, a fast running pony and a still, pale face, not far from where they sat, broke in upon their quiet talk, and both sprang to their feet and hastened forward. A poor lame child, who had been quietly amusing himself by the roadside, had been rudely thrown down, but happily, not trodden upon, by the pony. It was driven by a careless youth, who, scarce looking at the prostrate form, was whipping the pony to hasten on, when Dudley sprang forward, caught the bridle, and cried, "Stop, sir!"

"Let go!" cried the surprised youth.

"No, sir! I shall not let go until you stop and apologize for your carelessness."

"I will not apologize to that ragamuffin."

"He is no ragamuffin, and if you do not come willingly, I will make you."

George had gathered the little fellow in his arms and was gently bathing his forehead and hands from a fountain near by, when Dudley, leading the haughty looking boy, came forward.

"Give him to me, George. Poor lad, he is more frightened than hurt," he said, as the blue eyes looked up wonderingly into his.

He was a beautiful little fellow, about ten years of age, with a pitiful limp in his walk that seemed to appeal to one's heart in a more than usual degree, because of the lovely face and the timid, shrinking manner of the child.

"Am I not too heavy?" he asked, with a wan smile, as he looked up in Dudley's face, while he nestled confidingly in his arms.

"No, my lad, not a bit of it. I could lift a much heavier chap than you. Tell me where you live and I will take you home. We have a carriage here." Then he said to the boy who had caused the accident, "You may be off now, and see that you are more careful next time, where you ride and how fast you go."

The boy turned in a sulky mood to depart, when the other little fellow said, "You did not mean to hurt me. Do not feel badly about it."

He stopped, and saying, "I am sorry it happened," was soon out of sight.

The place to which the child directed them was a poor room in a tenement house. In answer to their knock, a pale, delicate, refined woman opened the door, with a startled exclamation, as she saw her child there in the arms of a stranger.

"Do not be alarmed, madam," exclaimed Dudley. "Your little man has met with a slight accident, but is not at all seriously hurt. I happened to be sitting with a friend, fortunately, just near the place. I am a physician and will take the liberty, with your permission, of prescribing a soothing medicine before I go, as my little patient needs quiet and rest."

"You are very kind, sir," she replied, as she gently smoothed back the dark locks and kissed the fair face of her child. "I seldom allow him to go so far from home, but he seemed to need the fresh air. He is a delicate child, and as he wanted to go to the park, I allowed him to do so. I never thought of any danger."

Looking up as he heard the quiver in her voice, the little fellow said, "Don't be sorry, mamma. I am not really much hurt."

"Good bye, my little man, I shall come to see you to-morrow. May I?"

"Oh, yes, please do!" he exclaimed, "and will the other gentleman come with you?"

"Yes, I am sure he will, if you want him to. Here is my address," he said, handing his card to the lady.

She glanced at it, then said, "I thank you very much for your kindness, Doctor Verner. My name is Mrs. Fraser and this is my son Donald." Then she added, after a moment, smiling through her tears, "He is the only son of his mother, and she a widow, like the one of old."

Dudley was deeply moved. He could say nothing, but extending his hand to mother and son, with a courteous bow he took his leave.

As he entered the carriage, George noticed that something had touched him, but he waited to have Dudley speak and tell him what he chose.

"I have kept you waiting, George," he said at length, "but I know you will pardon me."

"How is the little fellow now?"

"Comfortable, and sends a request that 'the other gentleman' (who has evidently made quite an impression on the child) will come with me for the visit which I promised to make to-morrow. Will you come?"

Christian Believers One Body in Christ*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"THEY continued steadfast in the apostles' teaching and fellowship, in the breaking of bread and prayers."

Who? The apostles and those who had been in the upper room together, awaiting the descent of the Holy Spirit, and a gathering crowd of people.

Where? The apostles and others, having left the upper room, were in the court of the house, and making their way to the street, where the crowd had gathered.

When? Shortly after the descent of the Holy Spirit, between nine and ten o'clock in the morning.

Why? The crowd had come together that they might learn what was the occasion of the great noise, like a mighty wind. The apostles had gone down to meet the people, in order that they might begin the work of preaching the Gospel.

The Preacher, the Sermon, the Listeners, the Converts

The preacher was Peter, and the eleven stood with him. There were eleven other apostles, because Matthias had been chosen by them to take the place of Judas (Acts 1:23-26).

The Sermon. It was a marvel in its construction, in its delivery, in its result. It has been said that: "1. It does not appeal to the imagination; contains no word painting, no sensuous imagery, no brilliant rhetoric; it is not sensational. 2. It contains little exhortation, and no appeal to the feelings; it is not passional. 3. It contains no metaphysical or abstruse teachings. It embodies the essential doctrine of the Gospel, but no refined speculations respecting them. It declares the work of the Spirit, but does not discuss how the Spirit works in the hearts of men; declares the truth of the resurrection, but does not discuss the nature of the resurrection; . . . declares the Messiahship of Jesus, but does not discuss his nature. . . . 4. It is mainly a statement of facts: Christ's character, life and miracles; his death, his resurrection, his ascension. 5. The whole argument rests on these considerations: Facts known to the hearers, facts testified to by the apostles from their personal knowledge. 6. Its object and effect is to produce a personal sense of sin, and that the particular sin of rejecting the Messiah and Saviour of the nation and the world."—Dr. Abbott.

The sermon was either preached in several languages, or was commented upon and explained in several languages by the apostles who had received the gift of tongues.

The Listeners. Every man heard the Gospel in his own tongue wherein he was born. All were amazed, some were perplexed, others were incredulous, and charged the apostles with being drunken, which charge Peter stoutly denied, showing them how prophecy had been fulfilled in the descent of the Holy Spirit.

The Converts. There were about three thousand who received the Word in one day, and were baptized. And though many and of diverse nations, they became "one body in Christ," one family on earth and in heaven. And they were steadfast, and conducted themselves in such a manner as to win the good opinion of all people. And daily their number increased under the continued preaching of the Gospel, and under their own gracious influence.

The Birthday of the Church

Jesus was conceived by the Holy Spirit, and born in the manger of Bethlehem. The Church was conceived by the Holy Spirit in the upper room, and brought forth at Pentecost. Marvelous has been its growth. It would, perhaps, be impossible to tell just how many ministers of the Gospel there are to-day, successors to Peter, who preached that first sermon, but we do know that over sixteen thousand missionaries are now preaching the Gospel, and that, instead of one preaching place as on the birthday of the Church, there are now twenty-eight thousand mission stations, to say nothing of churches in Christian lands. Instead of three thousand converts, it is estimated that there are not less than five hundred million Christians, with ten millions of people in the world yet to be reached. So the church has still opportunity to grow. (These estimates are according to Beach's Geography of Protestant Missions.)

How the Church Grows

But how is the Church to grow? An illustration of how gems are produced may help us to know. John Ruskin was one day slowly walking the streets of London. It had been raining, and the mud was abundant. The thought occurred to him that he would have the mud analyzed, to find out the organic elements. This was accordingly done, and the London mud was found to consist of sand, clay, soot and water. Musing upon them, it occurred to him that these were the very substances from which precious gems are formed. From the sand or silica are formed onyx, chrysolite, agate, beryl, cornelian, chalcedony, jasper, sardius, amethyst; from the clay, the sapphire, ruby, emerald, topaz; from the soot, the diamond. Men cannot transform the mud into those glittering points of light, but God transforms the mud of depraved humanity into the glory of redeemed and beautiful souls, who sing "Unto Him that loveth us, and hath made us priests and kings unto God and his father."

But it must not be overlooked that, like almost everything else in the universe, the Christian life is a growth. The fact that Christian life conforms to the laws of growth, such as develop the seed into the tree, needs special emphasis, because several very common and tenacious errors are cherished through overlooking it. It seems to be assumed by many that conversion gives instantaneous perfection; not merely a new direction to life, not a planting of the life in a new soil only, but a fully developed and fruitful tree in a day. And it takes ages long to make the sand and clay and soot into gems!

The sweet faith and patience which is necessary for a soul's growth in the Christian life is told by Mrs. E. J. Clemens, of Scotland:

"Pilar was a Spanish Guarani woman, between thirty and forty years of age, who had been employed as a general servant in my home about three months.

"She could not read, and knew very few words of any language except her native Guarani. That is the original language of the Indians in that part of South America.

"Although her means of gaining knowledge and her ability to grasp new thoughts were extremely limited, she took great interest in my explanations of God's love, and soon began to ply me with questions. At last she asked, 'How God converted a soul, how he changed the heart.'

"I told her I did not know how he changed the heart of anyone, not even my own, but that he knew how, and would change hers for her and fill it with love to him if she would let him.

"A few days afterward, I found her sitting in the patio, with her head leaned back against the wall and her eyes closed. Thinking she probably had a headache, I asked whether she were sick.

"'Oh, no, señora, I am just letting God change my heart.'"

It must have been noticed that in the spring some plants put out their buds and blossoms first, and their leaves afterward, but that others put out their leaves first. One is just as good as the other, and one is just as really out as the other. Neither does it matter how the Christian life begins, whether with a powerful impression, or with slow, dawning light like the sunrise. Christians of either type should not feel unhappy or uncertain about their acceptance with God.

You ask me when I gave my heart to Christ?
I cannot tell
The day, or just the hour, I do not now
Remember well.
It must have been when I was all alone
The light of his forgiving Spirit shone
Into my heart, so clouded o'er with sin;
I think—I think 'twas then I let him in.
I do not know—
I cannot tell you when,
I only know
He is so dear since then.

Here are seven short rules to help a young Christian to grow:

Never neglect daily prayer.

Never neglect daily Bible reading.

Never think you can deceive God about yourself.

Never let a day pass without trying to do a Christian act.

Never do anything you cannot ask God's blessing upon.

Never take your rule of life from other Christians, but from Christ. Ask, "What would he do in my place?"

Never believe that which contradicts the Word of God.

An aged Christian was asked, "When did you become a child of God?" He replied: "I was converted when religion ceased to be a duty and became a pleasure."

We would recall again how exemplary were those Pentecost Christians, winning the favor of all the people. There is room for this kind of showing by Christians to-day. An old Quaker was once visited by a garrulous neighbor, who complained that he had the worst servants in the world, and that everybody seemed to conspire to make him miserable. "My dear friend," said the Quaker, "let me advise you to oil yourself a little." "What do you mean?" said the irritated old gentleman. "Well," said the Quaker, "I had a door in my house some time ago that was always creaking on its hinges, and I found that everybody avoided it, and, although it was the nearest way to most of the rooms, yet they went round some other way. So I just got some oil, and after a few applications it opened and shut without a creak or a jar, and now everybody just goes to that door and uses the old passage. Just oil yourself a little with the oil of kindness. Occasionally praise your servants for something they do well. Encourage your children more than you scold them, and you will be surprised to find that a little sunshine will wear out a lot of fog. A little bit of molasses is better than a great deal of vinegar."

The Traditional Tomb of Daniel the Prophet in Luristan, Persia

THERE is a tradition in the Eastern world that Daniel, in his old age, returned from his place of exile to Judea, was made governor of all Syria, and finally died at Susa (or Shushan), where the Persian kings had their winter residence. It is claimed, however, by the people of Luristan, that the great prophet's bones lie within the tomb shown in the photograph above, which is greatly venerated by the Shiah sect of Mohammedans throughout Western Persia.

A Blackboard Hint

Draw a wheel on the blackboard. The wheel represents the Church. The hub is Christ, the spokes are the different denominations into which the Church is now divided, so many that we wonder sometimes if they can be one body in Christ. It is said that there are one hundred and fifty-three denominations in the United States; how we should have to increase the spokes in the wheel picture! But this is true—the nearer the spokes are to the hub, the closer they are together. And so the nearer Christians live to Christ, the closer together are the churches in love and sympathy.

The Church One Body in Christ

All believers at Pentecost were as one body, because they had all things in common; but the Church to-day takes on another form of unity. We call it "federation." This was wondrously realized about four years ago, when there assembled in New York City the accredited delegates of 18,000,000 Christians, members of various churches.

EARTHQUAKE SLAYS THOUSANDS

Over 100,000 Perish in the Greatest Calamity of Modern Times—An Appeal for Help

ON THE morning of December 28 a frightful earthquake visited Southern Italy, changing the geographical outline of a large part of the country, destroying cities, towns and villages almost in an instant and carrying down to a sudden and shocking death a great multitude of human beings. It is estimated that somewhere between 100,000 and 200,000 men and women and children perished in this awful calamity, which came upon them literally like "a thief in the night," upheaving rocks and mountains, shaking down whole cities as though the dwellings were of sand, and crushing, maiming and swallowing up their population like some devouring monster.

This appalling earthquake, which was one of the most violent and destructive ever known in ancient or modern times, had apparently for its centre the Straits of Messina, lying between the province of Calabria, on the Italian mainland, and the island of Sicily. Three great volcanoes—Etna, Vesuvius and Stromboli—are within this area of volcanic disturbance. Many times in previous years severe earthquakes have visited this ill-fated region, but all of these experiences have been utterly eclipsed by the present tremendous catastrophe, which by one mighty volcanic spasm has practically blotted the beautiful Calabrian city of Reggio out of existence and laid in ruins Taormina, Catania, Reposto, Paterno, Messina, all in Sicily, and Santa Severina, Cotrone, Catanzaro, Bagnara, Monteleone, San Giovanni, Gioja and a number of smaller towns and villages in Calabria, on the mainland.

It seems impossible to grasp the full extent of this colossal disaster, which has struck terror into the hearts of the Italian people and bowed them with sorrow. The earthquake shocks, as described by refugees from Messina, began at 5:30 A.M., while the people were asleep, and lasted about thirty seconds. In that brief space the whole strait was convulsed, and towns and villages laid in ruins, with their hapless inhabitants. The sea became greatly agitated, doubtless due to some sudden change beneath. Suddenly a huge tidal wave arose and swept through the strait, carrying everything before it, tossing ships as though they were of paper, tearing big vessels from their anchorage, and filling the waters with wreckage. This monster wave, accompanied by a roaring and terrifying sound, swept inland, doing tremendous damage and adding heavily to the list of mortalities inflicted by the earthquake. Soon the ruins of the crumbled towns caught fire and columns of smoke arose in all directions.

To add to the horrors of the situation in several cities, robbers began to plunder the wrecked buildings and even to rob the dead and injured. At Messina, six of these vandals were shot dead. Stern measures alone checked the lawless element from perpetrating unheard-of atrocities.

It is only by fragmentary reports from survivors that the awful nature of the calamity can be rightly understood. In Messina hundreds were penned under walls and rafters for thirty hours. Five children were rescued alive from the ruins of their home, where they had clung to the corpse of their mother, who had given her life to shield them. The prison collapsed, and the convicts, save a few who perished in the ruins, escaped and began to loot. The barracks were demolished. The chief of police was crushed to death and also the military commander and scores of police and soldiers.

Reggio suffered most and is now little more than a pile of smoking ruins. Cannitello and Lazarro, near by, were also destroyed by the 'quake and the tidal wave. Survivors say that the shocks threw the sleeping people from their beds; walls of houses split, heavy furniture creaked and fell in pieces, crumbling chimneys and tiles showered down upon the people as they fled along the streets. To add to the general terror, a furious rainstorm, with hail, swept the whole of the devastated section, and pelted the maddened refugees as they fled, many of them almost naked, vainly seeking shelter.

Many of those refugees who reached Catania were dumb with terror and others were insane through their sufferings. They declare that thousands have been demented and are wandering aimlessly about the ruins of their former homes, calling for their wives and children.

A correspondent cables from Rome that the conviction prevails in that city that under Messina and Reggio are buried thousands of dead. He adds: "All the country along the Straits of Messina suffered. Lower down the coast the sea rushed with terrific violence into Giarre, Riposto, Borgon and San Giovanni, sweeping away houses, ships, fishing boats and human beings. All fishing boats disappeared. On the coast of Calabria, at Palmi and Bagnara, the dead are counted by hundreds, the injured by the thousands. In all the islands and throughout the province of Calabria the ravages are frightful. From all directions come telegrams announcing that scores of bodies are buried beneath the ruins. Reggio and Messina are ablaze. Sailors disembarked from the Italian warships Regina Elena, Re Vittorio Emanuele and Napoli are trying in vain to extinguish the flames. General Cotto, commanding the military at Messina, is among the dead. Captain Passino, of the cruiser Piedmonte, perished with his family. Fulci, deputy for Messina, is buried in the ruins.

"Survivors from Reggio say the lower part of the town disappeared under an avalanche of rubbish. The public buildings on Via Plutino, the churches, the Mezzacapo barracks and the Prefecture are all destroyed. One account says there are but five survivors out of 17,000 in Reggio.

"In the wreck of the Custom House barracks at Messina out of 200 men only 41 escaped. In the railroad station, out of 280 employees 272 disappeared."

Nurieo, Milo, Paterno, Acireale and Maletto—all towns in Sicily—are badly damaged. In Calabria, the town of Cozenza has 500 dead; Palme lost 1,000, Semmara 500, Bagnara 2,000, Cassano 1,000.

The latest estimates place Reggio's loss at 45,000 dead, Messina 50,000 dead, and the long line of towns and villages will probably bring up the total to between 100,000 and 200,000.

Such in brief is the meagre outline of the great earthquake which, in one brief moment, accomplished more destruction of human life than war, pestilence and famine united could have done in a much longer period. But the real story of the catastrophe cannot be told until the entombed living are rescued, and the dead and missing accounted for, which latter task may occupy weeks.

Trains brought the refugees from stricken Messina to Palermo and Catania by the thousands. The trains returning to Messina bore nurses, physicians, hospital outfits and soldiers. Among the refugees were hundreds of injured. Others were sick from days of exposure and fear. Numbers had turned violently insane. All mourn relatives, families or friends. The fugitives, exhausted by their woes, were most of them incapable of giving a coherent account of what befell the doomed city.

King Victor Emmanuel and Queen Elena proceeded to Catania the day following the earthquake. They made their way through the streets, viewing the wreckage of buildings. Next they visited Messina, where the sight of the shattered buildings and the crowds of refugees so affected the Queen that she almost swooned. Crowds of terror-stricken victims swarmed around the royal party, prostrating themselves in the mud, and screaming for help. The Prefect of Messina sends this telegram:

"The disaster surpasses all that can be imagined. The corpses in Messina number tens of thousands. It is impossible to make even an approximate estimate of the exact number.

"It is equally impossible to describe the general consternation and disorder which prevail in the city. No amount of assistance will be excessive.

"The principal necessity is haste. Provisions especially must be had at once."

A great national committee has been formed in Italy to collect funds for relief. The committee is headed by the Duke of Aosta, and includes the presidents of the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies, the Mayor of Rome, and all prominent men in the leading towns. The subscription list has been opened with $40,000, contributed by the King.

Messina, Italy, Now in Ruins, in the Heart of the Earthquake District

Thousands of refugees have found their way to Palermo. Some of these declare that several villages near Messina have totally disappeared. They say the coast line is greatly changed near the Straits, which are almost closed by the upheaval. Human bodies and debris line the beaches. Over a great stretch of country lies the silence of death.

In view of the terrible nature and widespread extent of the calamity, and of the urgent need of immediate relief for the survivors, the naval vessels of England and Russia now in or near Italian waters have proceeded to the Straits of Messina to render such assistance as may be possible.

The great heart of the Christian world goes out to the poor sufferers, and already relief movements are planned in our own and other lands for that purpose. In this appalling calamity—one of the vastest the world has ever known—there are many things that call for practical and immediate sympathy. The homeless thousands and the sick and injured constitute a first charge upon the world's Christian benevolence, and the call to service in their behalf should not be neglected. In several of our States, the Governors have already issued appeals to our generous people for succor for the stricken in Southern Italy. Chambers of Commerce and other business organizations are moving in the matter, and it is probable that the relief work will soon take active practical shape. Meanwhile, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose readers in the past have done such splendid service in relief work in many lands, will be prepared to receive contributions for the earthquake sufferers. It is now in communication with the Italian authorities, with a view to definite relief plans.

As the need of relief is urgent, and as whatever is done must be done quickly, it is hoped that our readers and their friends will give promptly and liberally for this worthy purpose. All contributions for the earthquake sufferers should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York. Every contribution will be acknowledged in these columns.

Questions and Answers

J. J. B., Lansingburg, N. Y. What progress has been made in Denmark in regard to old age pensions?

When the deserving aged have reached their sixtieth year, and are unable to provide for themselves, the State supplies a Home and grants each 20 kroner a year. A kroner is equal to 27 cents.

I. D., Gouverneur, N. Y. 1. Do you know the best way to clean old oil-paintings? 2. Also, do you know the best way to clean the inside of stovepipes, gummed up by lighting fires constantly with kerosene?

1. A lady who has tried it sends the following: Take your oil-painting out of its frame, and lay it on a firm table. Cut the end off a raw potato and rub the painting gently with the cut end, cutting off a thin slice as often as it is soiled. Then rinse with tepid water and a large, soft sponge. Another rule is to rub the painting softly with the finger, wet in warm water; or, if the dirt is very hard and old, using oil instead of water. Let it rest a few hours before rinsing, in order to allow the cleanser to do its work. One authority says never use soap in cleaning pictures. Another says weak, warmish suds for rinsing is better than clear water. 2. Several stove dealers have been consulted about the cleansing of the insides of gummed pipes. They say that it can be done only by taking down the pipes, knocking off the hardened parts with a strong tool, and then rubbing with kerosene or some other powerful cleanser; but, as stovepipes are not expensive, they advise, by all means, new pipes.

T. A. R., Fishkill, N. Y. Tell me something about St. Cecilia.

According to the martyrologies, Cecilia was a Roman lady, who became a martyr in the third century. She is the patron of the blind and also of musicians, and, it is said, was the "inventor of the organ," but this last claim may well be doubted. Dryden and Pope both wrote odes in her honor.

J. McB., Toronto, Canada. In what country is the wax palm found, and is it of any commercial value?

The carnauba or wax palm is found in Brazil and other parts of tropical South and Central America. The leaves are coated with wax. When dried the wax comes off in a fine powder. It is then melted, made into cakes and used to manufacture candles. The palm tree wax, so-called, of ordinary commerce, is made of two different plants of the same family. The wax is on the stems and is scraped off. About twenty-five pounds may be taken from one tree.

J. H., Algona, Ia. For what purpose was the cruise of the American fleet undertaken?

For the double purpose of improving our navy by seagoing practice and of demonstrating to the world the efficiency of our fleet and our power as a naval nation. We might add, also, of cementing friendly relations with other countries, particularly Japan.

B. E., Nova Scotia. What sort of an animal is the recently discovered okapi, mentioned frequently in recent scientific magazines?

The okapi was discovered in 1901 in the Semlike forest in East Africa, by Sir Henry Johnston. It is something like the giraffe, but smaller, short neck, and short limbs. The first specimen had horns, but the skulls of two have been found which have none. The head is fawn color and the body a purplish brown. The legs are white with brown bars.

P. B., Tipp City, O. Can a person be born so low that he could not enter the kingdom of heaven?

No. God is no respecter of persons, or of social distinctions. To him king and slave are alike. His goodness is over all and his Son is Saviour of all. Christ saves "to the uttermost."

Reader, Knoxville, Ia. Was John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, ever married? There are different views about it.

In 1751, according to his biographers, he married Mrs. Vazeille, the widow of a London merchant. It was not a happy union. She died in 1781 while Wesley was in the west of England. They had no children.

J. B. Z., Flanagan, Ill. Explain the Song of Solomon 1:5. I heard a preacher say that Jesus belonged to the black race, and by that chapter he tried to prove it.

The Song of Solomon is held by commentators to be a spiritual allegory, the principal figures being Christ and his Church. In the fifth verse, the Church speaks, drawing the image from the dark-tinted goatskins with which the Arabs of Kedar, in Arabia Petrea, cover their tents, as contrasted with the splendor of the king's royal tent in which he awaited the Church's coming. It has no relation to the race or complexion of Christ.

Miss S. J., Scranton, Pa. Is it true that there is a man by the name of Koot-Hoomi living at the present time, in the Himalaya Mountains, and who is 2,000 years old?

Theosophists of the Blavatsky school claim that there is such a man—a Mahatma, or holy man—living in the mountains somewhere near Tibet. He is, no doubt, one of the pleasing inventions of the Theosophists, who have located him conveniently out of reach, so that nobody can disprove their assertion.

Mrs. M. E. M., Lebanon, Ky. After the building of Solomon's temple, what became of Hiram? Did he die a natural death, or was he killed?

Josephus, the Jewish historian, quotes from Mercander, to the effect that Hiromius (Hiram) lived fifty-three years and reigned thirty-four. He built many other temples besides assisting in Solomon's temple. His own monument or sarcophagus is still extant, near the village of Himaneh, between Safed and Tyre. Phœnician historians say Solomon married Hiram's daughter. How Hiram died is not made apparent, but he probably died a natural death.

Mrs. A. H. R., Central Village, Conn. Do you think it wrong to play games on Sunday? I enjoy reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I love to read the sermons in it every Sunday.

The Lord's Day is for rest and worship, and should neither be devoted to work (except work of necessity) nor to pleasure. We should class games in the latter category.

C. P., New Bethlehem, Pa. What became of Miss Cisneros, who was made prisoner in Cuba during the Spanish war?

Miss Evangelina Cisneros, after escaping from a Spanish prison in Havana, came to New York, and afterward returned to Cuba and married Lieutenant Carbonell, who had aided her in her escape.

A. H., Cedarvale, Kan. 1. Who was the Pope of Rome, and in what year did the Catholics announce the doctrine of purgatory? 2. We read that "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven," but Job says, "Yet in my flesh shall I see God." 3. How many hundred thousand was John supposed to have baptized?

1. The doctrine of purgatory was announced most fully in the time of Gregory the Great (595 A. D.), although it had been practically outlined earlier. It was held by the Greeks, and, in a sense, by the ancient Hebrews. The Council of Trent expounded it in full in 1536. 2. The Revised Version corrects the translation, and makes it read "yet without my flesh," etc. 3. No reliable estimate possible.

J. N. R., Newark, N. Y. Where were General Custer and his force massacred?

On the Little Big Horn, in Montana, on June 25, 1876, General Custer, with 1,100 men, made an attack on a large body of Sioux, which had gone on the war path. Later, it was found that the Indians numbered about 9,000. A monument now marks the spot where Custer and his men fell.

Reader, St. Augustine, Fla. Where is Penn College? Is it in charge of the Society of Friends?

Penn College is at Oskaloosa, Ia. It has an attendance of between four and five hundred students. It was founded by the Society of Friends in 1873.

I. McM., Orange, N. J. Did the camel ever exist in America as a native animal?

Some scientists think so. Professor F. B. Loomis, in a recent address before a scientific society in New York, said that in the West he had dug up several skeletons which had most of the characteristics of the camel as he is seen in the East at present. The minor differences, he said, came from environment. Many years ago the government imported camels for the use of troops on the plains of the Southwest. They were used for transportation for several years.

Rose M., Corvallis, Oregon. No doubt the rulers of China and of Japan heard of the Gospel of Christ, but did the Empress-Dowager Tsze-Hsi-An, ever hear the Gospel? Was it ever preached to her in person? Likewise, the Mikado? The Church has many missionaries both in China and in Japan. The Gospel of Christ is the "one thing needful." How saddening it is if these rulers never had the Gospel preached to them directly!

Yes. Not only did the Empress-Dowager have the Gospel presented to her, but several years ago she was the recipient of a beautiful copy of the Scriptures, the gift of thousands of Christian women in China. This incident so awakened the Emperor's interest, that he also received a copy. One was sent, and the missionaries have the assurance that he read it. We cannot say whether he read the whole.

E. L. P., Ontario, Canada. Would you kindly inform me why the battlefield at Quebec is called the Plains of Abraham?

The Plains were named after a Scotchman, Abraham Martin, to whom the land was granted in the early part of the seventeenth century. He used the Plains as a pasture for his cattle. Any good guide book to the city of Quebec or the Dominion of Canada will give the whole history of the Plains.

Thanks and Kind Wishes

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I would like to tell you how much I appreciate the book, World Famed Stories and Legends. That alone was worth more than the price asked, and as a premium was quite enough; but then came those beautiful pictures. Surely they are the climax! Many, many thanks. May the editor and his staff enjoy the holidays from year to year and receive the gratitude of the multitudes who look forward, from week to week, for the well-loved HERALD.

THE LITTLE DOCTOR

"Surely I will. I felt drawn to the little one very much. Is there a family?"

"Just the mother, a lady, evidently out of place in her present poverty-stricken surroundings, and this one child. From the things in the room, the sewing-machine and the pieces of work lying around, I judge she must be trying to earn her livelihood by sewing. No wonder she sent the child out for a breath of fresh air, which both must need sadly in such quarters. I can't understand how she dared to trust him in the street cars, but he is a bright child."

"What a pleasure it must be to be able to give help and comfort as you can to those in distress, Dudley!"

"Yes, I never felt that so keenly as I did to-day, when I saw how much gratitude was showered upon me for doing so little. These are of the kind of persons not reached by public charity—no one would dare insult this lady, I am sure, by offering help unsought—and she is one of the worthy poor who really need help—and also one of the persons who would rather starve than make their wants known. One can see by her manner that she would give her very life for that boy, and she looks as if she were wearing herself out in trying to keep body and soul together. We must take some fruit or other delicacy with us when we go there to-morrow."

"Yes, we can do that without hurting her feelings, under the circumstances. I wish I had some of our delicious fruit from Branksome."

The next morning rather early, our two young friends started for the home of Mrs. Fraser and Donald, laden with fruit and other dainties, some of which had been prepared by the good woman in whose house Dudley had his office, and who was in sympathy with all his plans for bringing help and comfort to the poor.

"Oh! we must have some flowers, too," said Dudley. "Come this way."

The florist greeted him as he entered, as though he were a frequent visitor, and brought forth his very choicest flowers, from which Dudley selected a handsome bouquet. Then he picked out a beautiful "La France" rose-bush, full of buds, with one newly opened rose.

"It will be a pleasure for that poor tired mother," said the young doctor, "to watch the flowers open, to water and tend it, perhaps taking her back to happier days. Do you know, George, I am so thankful to be able to do such things as this. With the poor practice which usually falls to the lot of a young physician, I could not have made enough money to spend freely, and I could not bear to see want and not be able to relieve it."

"I did not know," replied George, "that you were such an enthusiast in your profession."

"It has been my lot to be cast at times among suffering people, some of them too poor to employ a physician, others doing without necessary food and clothing in order to pay the bills of some of these extortioners—I can call them nothing else. I have always thought since I was a child and delighted in caring for wounded dogs and other animals, and binding up the broken limbs of birds and chickens—that some day I would be a real doctor and cure sick people.

"I think what roused me up and confirmed me in my plans more than anything else, was a shocking case that came to my knowledge last year. A noted physician refused to perform an operation on a lame child until the father, a struggling mechanic, who, by dint of perseverance and hard labor, had secured a cozy little home for himself and family, would give him a mortgage on the house for his fee. Yes, the famous Doctor Screw, of P—, was the very man—but here we are at our little friend's house."

Running lightly up the stairway, he tapped at the door, which was opened by Mrs. Fraser, who said, "Good morning, doctor. Donald will be pleased enough to see you."

The boy's breath was presently almost taken away by surprise, as the lovely bouquet was placed in his hands.

"Oh, mamma!" he cried, "isn't this a beauty?"

"Perhaps your mother will like this," said Dudley, as he placed the blooming plant on the table.

With glistening eyes she tried to thank him, then sat down and sobbed aloud.

He quietly withdrew, returning soon with George. Together they carried the baskets of fruit and other delicacies, George remaining at the door, while Dudley entered to see if Mrs. Fraser were composed enough to meet another stranger.

"Pardon me," she said, "this rose spoke of the past too loudly for my composure. I thank you exceedingly."

"Will you see my friend now, Donald? He is here."

"Oh, yes, bring him in," he cried.

"Mrs. Fraser, this is my friend, Mr. Hunter, whom your little son met yesterday," said Dudley, as he returned with George.

She glanced toward the stranger, tried to speak, and just as George said, "Ellen, is it you?" she fainted away.

Mrs. Whittemore's Rescue Work

ADJUTANT MRS. E. M. WHITTEMORE, founder of the Door of Hope, has lately returned to New York from an extended tour undertaken in behalf of the work, which is now under control of the Salvation Army. From Nova Scotia last spring, where some most interesting services were held (resulting in the opening of Door of Hope 71, at Sydney, C. B.), a journey was taken to the Pacific Coast, and for several months, from time to time, large gatherings were held in various cities and towns in Southern California. In the Middle West, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Winona, Peoria, Bloomington, Hannibal, and even in Mitchell, Ind., large audiences were addressed, and God wondrously manifested his power. In some of the meetings as many as forty would request prayer.

The Los Angeles Door of Hope is also being greatly blessed. Prisons, shelters and halls were visited in some cities. During Mrs. Whittemore's extended absence, the "mother" Door of Hope has also been progressive spiritually, and the reports have been of a stimulating nature.

Door of Hope 72, in Hamilton, O., and the Springfield, O., Door of Hope 70 are also doing excellent work.

A Splendid Book for the Family

Dear Dr. Klopsch:

This morning I received the premium book, World-Famed Stories and Legends. For the small additional cost of fifty cents I have received a book of the best literature, interesting reading for the present and an excellent book of reference for the future. I have at once written to recommend it to the mother of some children, whose demand for good stories always exceeds the supply, and who at the same time needs just such a book of reference for use in their school work in English. Religion and Medicine

THE Moral Control of Nervous Disorders. By Elwood Worcester, D.D. Ph.D.; Samuel McComb, M.A., D.D. (of Emmanuel Church, Boston); and Isador H. Coriat, M.D. Moffat, Yard & Co., New York. $1.50. In the language of the authors, the object of this book is to describe in plain terms the work in behalf of nervous sufferers which has been undertaken in Emmanuel Church, Boston. No topic of the time is more eagerly discussed among Christians than this. The great success of the Christian Science movement, and its demonstration of the power of the mind over the body, has called fresh attention, and given a mightier scope, to this old truth. In Emmanuel Church, for three years, a tuberculosis class has been in successful operation. Its conductors are now extending their efforts to the alleviation of nervous disorders. Many churches and clergymen are adopting, with success, the Emmanuel methods. Others are hesitating. Perhaps no single innovation has ever been watched with sincerer interest than this, though its authors claim that it is not strictly an innovation, but, rather, a return to apostolic customs.

John Jasper*

A DISTINGUISHED professor in one of our best educational institutions visited Richmond a few years ago, and heard John Jasper preach. "I have listened," he said, "to the most famous orators of my time, but never have I been so swayed and moved by genuine eloquence as I was by that illiterate colored preacher. He really believed that man can stand in the spirit in the presence of the ineffable God. He was there that day, and he seemed to take us there with him." This simple African was fortunate enough to have an observing and appreciative friend among his white ministerial brethren, in the person of the Rev. W. E. Hatcher, who has now written the story of his life. It is as interesting as any great novel. Mr. Hatcher has given in it the whole of Jasper's famous sermon on "The sun do move," as well as some others. The "reportorial" style of the author must sometimes slightly offend the serious reader; but, on the whole, we have in this book a vivid and unique characterization, which every minister should study carefully, and which is a distinct addition to our stock of literary types.

Complete Recovery from Coffee Ills.

"About nine years ago my daughter, from coffee drinking, was on the verge of nervous prostration," writes a Louisville lady. "She was confined for the most part to her home.

"When she attempted a trip down town she was often brought home in a cab, and would be prostrated for days afterwards.

"On the advice of her physician she gave up coffee and tea, drank Postum, and ate Grape-Nuts for breakfast.

"She liked Postum from the very beginning and we soon saw improvement. Today she is in perfect health, the mother of five children, all of whom are fond of Postum.

"She has recovered, is a member of three charity organizations and a club, holding an office in each. We give Postum and Grape-Nuts the credit for her recovery."

How We Know the Father*

IT PLEASES a certain class of people to think of our religion as a sort of an allegory.

Such an imaginative conception may be in some cases an aid to spirituality. But to most of us the plain Scriptural statements regarding a personal God; the actual sonship of Christ, yet his practical identity with the Father; and the Bible descriptions of rewards and of punishments, appeal more directly and reasonably. It is by picturing God to ourselves as the Bible shows him to us, that most of us are best able to approach and to realize him.

Yet to every earnest seeker there come hours of darkness when we cannot seem to catch the vision of his face, nor to grasp his hand; when we echo the cry of Job: "Behold, I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him; on the left hand, where he doth work, but I cannot behold him; he hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see him."

The exalted mood in which the Christian seems to be in the presence of God and to realize his existence, is not constant with any of us. And yet by the "drawing of the Father," of which John writes, and which undoubtedly refers to the call of the Spirit in our hearts, we may rise out of the shadows into the light. It can be done by prayer, and by prayer alone.

Professor Peabody writes, "We hear much of the reasons which lead men to abandon prayer, but in most instances the loss of the prayer habit does not happen because of profound philosophizing or serious conviction, but through sheer inertia. There are so many other things to do, that, as a young man once said, 'one does not get around to his prayers.'"

That this indictment is often true must be confessed by many of our young people. If they complain that they seem to have lost their sense of the presence of God, it is almost invariably because they have been neglecting prayer.

Drummond has said, "Reflect the character of Christ, and you will become like Christ." This cannot be done by any mechanical method. Any mere following of the rules of morality and right living will not serve. There must be a deep-seated, passionate longing to realize the presence of God in Christ, and this can be achieved and retained only by reiterating daily, and semi-daily, the prayer of Thomas, "Show me the Father."

"The pre-eminent spiritual facts of the race are set aside by those who ask for an unhistoric revelation," says President King, of Oberlin. "Significant and indubitable facts are Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Jesus."

They have lived—men like ourselves; and in the man Jesus were discerned, by all who knew him, a something which was not of men—a something which has proven to be the most powerful leaven for spiritual uplift and for righteousness that the world has ever known; nothing less than God himself—come down to earth.

Most eloquently does Matheson discourse of this vivid reality of Christ—ever enduring—elevating life, sweetening death. "Son of man, whenever I doubt, I think of thee. Thou never growest old to me. Last century is old, last year is old, last season is an obsolete fashion; but thou art not obsolete. Thou art abreast of all the centuries. A thousand have fallen at thy side, but thou hast kept thy bloom; old Jerusalem, old Rome, new Rome—thou hast been young amid them all. I measure the promise of my manhood by thee."

The City of Destruction*

THERE is, perhaps, nothing harder for Christians to realize, especially young Christians, than that this comfortable, merry, entertaining world is a "City of Destruction."

It is almost impossible for them to understand that their un-Christian companions are headed toward the blackness of darkness, and are tainted with a sin which will eat away their souls unless some saving power is exerted to save them.

Gipsy Smith has a strong sermon upon the episode of Paul and Silas in the prison. Just as Evangelist insisted that Christian, without delay, should turn back from the town where dwelt Legality, and plod wearily on again to the little wicket gate, so Paul doubtless preached to the jailer not only "Believe," but also a practical religión. We are led to this conclusion because "he took them the same hour of the night and washed their stripes."

The jailer had cruelly caused those stripes. Now, under the saving influence of Christ, he strove his best to undo his sin, by trying to heal the wounds that he had made. He not only believed the words of his Evangelist, but he turned and began to do his duty, just as Christian turned at once and resumed his journey to the wicket gate.

Thus the young Christian, though he is in the midst of alluring pleasures, when once he is informed concerning the real nature of this world, that it is a City of Destruction, will turn from it.

Mr. Moody tells us in his great sermon on "Repentance" that there are five steps to be taken before one can become a Christian—conviction, contrition, confession of sin, conversion and confession of Christ.

He illustrates the case of a man who knows that he has sinned, yet feels no sorrow for it, by the story of Saul, who said to Samuel, "I have sinned; yet honor me now, I pray thee, before the elders of Israel."

In David's case, on the contrary, there was real sorrow for sin. The whole burden of his wonderful fifty-first Psalm is the cry of a heart broken and bleeding with contrition.

The failure to confess our sin to God is equally fatal. There can be no true Christianity without this. Sins that have been committed must be confessed. The new love for Christ must also be confessed.

As Gipsy Smith says, in his inimitable way, "there must be stripe washing, and stripe washing in the sight of men, before the soul can be sure of salvation."

Dr. Jowett, the famous English preacher, reminds us that Matthew Arnold considered sin as not a monster, but an infirmity; but he himself considered sin much more than an infirmity. For an infirmity, we have no sense of guilt. For sin, we feel guilt.

Poe, in his musical but terrible poem, "The Haunted Palace," compares the soul into which sin has entered, to a "radiant palace," in a green and beautiful valley.

> But evil things, in robes of sorrow,
> Assailed the monarch's high estate.
> . . . .
> And travelers now, within that valley,
> Thro' the red-litten windows see
> Vast forms, that move fantastically
> To a discordant melody;
> While, like a ghastly, rapid river,
> Through the pale, battered door,
> A hideous throng rush out forever.

So is the soul which harbors sin. It holds within itself a City of Destruction, which it must cast out or else peace and joy will be forever unknown to it. Instead (for which we have Christ's word), there will be, as a great poet has phrased it, but "the horror of the shade."

A HYMN

By Celia McCord Gebhard

THY love, dear Lord, I crave;
Thy blood my soul must save,
My sins remove.
O, wash them all away,
And let the light of day
Thy kindness prove.

In sorrow's darkest night,
When round faith's beacon light
Thick clouds increase,
Keep me from sinful fear;
Then in Thy love appear,
And bring me peace.

Thy love is all I ask;
With it will every task
A pleasure be.
My love, my life I give
To Thee, who now dost live,
But died for me.

Transcendent love was Thine,
To give Thy life for mine,
And die for all.
This love, dear Lord, I crave;
This love my soul must save;
I hear Thy call.

"Come unto Me, ye blest;
Come, and your souls shall rest;
In Me abide.
Then shall your cry be stilled;
Your hearts with love be filled;
Be satisfied."

MOTHER-LOVE IN CHINA

A LITTLE Bible-woman came to see me one day last autumn at the Hinghua Orphanage.

"Will you take a little girl and boy whose mother and grandmother live near here?"

"Why should I take them?" was my natural question in reply.

"They are very poor. The mother had been passing my door each day with the work she had finished for the shoe-shops; she returned with a pitiful mite of food for four people. The mother was so young and pretty, I became interested in her and visited her in the home. I persuaded them to come to church."

Two Orphan Babies

"Where is the father of these children?" was my next question.

"He went away three or four years ago and has never been heard from since. He was an opium-smoker. He has a brother who is still here in the city, but he, too, is an opium-smoker. He does not provide for his mother, nor brother's family."

"Well, if these two women have supported the children, why not continue?"

"It has been so little and the children now need more; but the worst thing is, the uncle of these children is now determined to sell them."

Then the whole sad picture unfolded, because it is so familiar.

"The opium-smoker sells the children; first the girl and then the boy. Nights of opium smoking will soon exhaust that money. A profligate companion suggests that a beautiful sister-in-law is a good, saleable article and soon we may see her being dragged away to satisfy that cursed opium craving."

Could I turn a deaf ear to such pleading? Could I be blind to this vision of sacrifice and suffering?

"Bring these women and children to see me," was my reply to the Bible-woman.

They came and they told the story, ending with: "We are afraid to let this go on longer. The wolf is hard to keep at bay, but the opium-smoker is so urgent about selling the children, that we fear he will steal them from us."

Thus the pretty seven-year-old girl and four-year-old boy came into the Orphanage. Not only so, but our orphans' sewing kept the little mother in safe refuge in the Orphanage home.

Would Christ have done it so? This is what you make possible in aiding the Orphanage. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, . . . ye have done it unto me."

This photograph shows two of the children recently brought to the Orphanage. They came in these baskets carried by the old man. The baby is a girl just about to have been sold to pay a debt, when a Christian relative interfered. The child was pinched and starved. Relief was necessary or the child would either starve or be sold.

The little boy is an orphan, left entirely helpless and dependent on distant relatives who looked on this added burden with hatred and grudging. He would be left to wander from one family to another to seek each meal. Many a hungry day would he see. There are in China no newspapers to sell, nor "shines" by which small boys may earn a few pennies to buy the absolute necessities.

We have a most interesting family of small children as well as older ones in our Orphanage. We have recently received about twenty-five new children. Each case was taken under the most careful consideration by a committee, and, based on the unbearable conditions of the children, we decided each in its turn.

Elizabeth Fisher Brewster.

Admiral Joseph B. Coghlan

IT WAS with a feeling of great regret that the American people heard that Rear Admiral Joseph B. Coghlan, retired, had passed away suddenly. Among many gallant officers the Admiral had stood conspicuous for his bravery, and his hearty, generous spirit had won for him a host of friends, from the man in the street to Dewey, Admiral of the Navy.

Admiral Coghlan served over forty years, and had seen active service in two wars. He was with Dewey at the battle of Manila Bay, his ship being the Raleigh. He was born in Frankfort, Ky., in 1844, and was appointed to Annapolis in 1860. He graduated in 1863, and then served on the sloop Sacramento until the close of the Civil War. From that time until the outbreak of the war with Spain he held positions of increasing responsibility. His last command was that of the Brooklyn Navy Yard. His funeral was held in Washington, with full naval honors.

A New Year's Greeting

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Whew! This beautiful book a present with The Christian Herald! How can you? And giving away hundreds of them, I suppose. The book came Saturday, and yesterday I sent it to a semi-invalid to read first, and I will read it after the holidays.

What a good time you will have in heaven, shaking hands with your friends, who are praying benedictions on your head now. A Merry Christmas and a blessed New Year to you and yours. Mrs. J. W.

Bardolph, Ill.

INTERESTING FACTS

Food Knowledge on the Farm.

With the Rural Free Delivery of mails, the farmer is as closely in touch with what is going on in the world as his city brother.

What to eat, in order to get the best out of one's brain and body, is as important for the modern farmer as the manufacturer, business man or professional worker. An Ills. farmer writes:

"I am a farmer and was troubled with chronic indigestion for two years—suffered great agony and could find no permanent relief from medicines.

"A friend suggested that I quit using so much starchy foods, which are the principal cause of intestinal indigestion. I began to use Grape-Nuts and have continued with most gratifying results.

"Grape-Nuts food has built me up wonderfully. I gained 6 lbs. the first four weeks that I used it. My general health is better than before, my brain is clear, my nerves strong.

"For breakfast and dinner I have Grape-Nuts with cream, a slice of crisp toast, a soft boiled egg and a cup of Postum. My evening meal is made of Grape-Nuts and cream, alone.

"This diet gives me good rest every night and I am now well again."

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Scientific and Practical Invention for Those Who Are Deaf or Partially Deaf—May Now be Tested in Your Own Home.

Deaf or partially deaf people may now make a month's trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This is unusually important news for the deaf, for by this plan the final selection of the one completely satisfactory hearing aid is made easy and inexpensive for everyone.

Mrs. C. Liddecka, 238 12th Ave., Maywood, Ill., wears an Electrophone less conspicuous than eyeglasses.

This new invention (U. S. Patent No. 763,575) renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear, and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises, and also so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural, unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

Prominent Business Man's Opinion

STOLZ ELECTROPHONE CO., Chicago.—I am pleased to say that the Electrophone is very satisfactory. Being small in size and great in hearing qualities makes it PREFERRABLE TO ANY I HAVE TRIED, and I believe I have tried all of them. I can recommend it to all persons who have defective hearing.—M. W. HOYT, Wholesale Grocer, Michigan Ave. and River St., Chicago.

Woman Suffrage in England

A SERIES of exciting scenes interrupted the Albert Hall meeting, in London, December 5, convened by the Women's Liberal Federation, but, by exercising great tact and patience, Mr. Lloyd-George, Chancellor of the Exchequer, secured a hearing. A feature of his address, which lasted two hours, was a repartee addressed to a young lady who said: "We have waited forty years," to which the Chancellor laughingly replied: "I must say that lady rather looks it. But if she has waited so long she can afford to wait another twenty minutes. Mr. Lloyd-George had only uttered a few sentences when he was interrupted by Miss Helen Ogston, who resisted ejection with a dog whip, which she used freely on the stewards who attempted to remove her. The Chancellor waited for the storm to subside, and then announced that the government had decided to introduce a bill granting the suffrage to women. It was a historic scene, and will be long remembered. The Federation repudiated responsibility for the violent course of the "suffragettes" who interrupted the meeting.

Chancellor Lloyd-George at the Albert Hall Meeting

THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH

By Mrs. M. Baxter

PETER had been commissioned, in common with the other disciples, to "teach all nations." They were instructed to begin at Jerusalem to be Christ's witnesses; and, now the power from on high was upon them, what should be the result?

Peter, as the spokesman, and surrounded by the eleven, had explained the prophesying of the hundred and twenty men and women who had been filled with the Holy Ghost, by the words of the prophet Joel. He pointed to the healing and the miracles of Jesus, which no rational Jew could attribute to any other power than that of God. Thus they stood convicted of having fought against God. "Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain: whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death; because it was not possible that he should be holden of it." He was life—spirit, soul and body; and no element of corruption dwelt in him; when he died, he gave up the ghost, his life was not taken from him, and it was impossible that he should be holden of death. In measure as he himself dwells in us, his life drives out all which is of sin and corruption and death; in spirit, soul, and body. "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."

What could Peter's auditors say? One hundred and twenty witnesses attested the resurrection of Jesus, and these hundred and twenty were testifying now, in a supernatural manner, in sixteen different languages, and with power which riveted the hearers, "the wonderful works of God." The testimony was too strong to be rejected. "When they heard this, they were pricked in their heart, and said, . . . Men and brethren, what shall we do?" This is always the effect of preaching in the power of the Holy Ghost, even when the instrument used is of the feeblest; the heart is pricked, a real wound is made, men are brought to see their right position before God; they are brought to reality about themselves and God; and the one cry of their hearts is, "What shall we do? Is there any remedy? Is there any way out of this?" Praise the Lord, there is, and it is at hand: "Repent, and be baptized"—i. e., "Turn right round, and let everybody know you do so." Men make great mistakes about repentance. Some speak of it as deep emotional sorrow for sin, and many try to produce this in their own hearts. Others make out that the simple acceptance of the fact that Jesus has died and atoned for their sins is a turning from their unbelief, and is therefore repentance. Some do this without definitely breaking with the past, and this leads to miserable so-called conversions, which are the greatest stumbling-block to the real work of God. Real repentance is a final, definite, and determined break with the past at all costs, and a real taking sides with God, and letting everybody know it.

Peter, speaking in the Spirit, boldly promised to every one who should repent, and be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, not only the remission of sins, but also "the gift of the Holy Ghost." God most surely meant that every converted man should be filled with the Holy Ghost.

"They that gladly received his word were baptized." They would lose caste, they would be misunderstood and persecuted; but they would be right with God, and there were three thousand of them! Glorious result of the first pentecostal sermon! "And all that believed were together"; sects and parties were unknown. They "had all things common"; in giving themselves away to the Lord they had included their possessions; they recognized that all they were and all they had was Christ's, and therefore one another's; the atmosphere was pure.

I Can Reduce Your Flesh Build Up Your Figure Correct Chronic Ailments

Would you like to accomplish these results by natural means and in a scientific, dignified manner?

I have helped over 20,000 women in the past six years by a few simple directions followed in the privacy of their own rooms.

Too Fleshy? I can reduce you and at the same time strengthen stomach and heart, and relieve you of such chronic ailments as:

Constipation	Rheumatism	Dullness	Sleeplessness
Torpid Liver	Weakness	Irritability	Weak Nerves
Indigestion	Catarrh	Nervousness	Weak Heart

I strengthen whatever organs are weak; start your blood to circulating as when you were a child; teach you to breathe so the blood is fully purified.

One Pupil Writes:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I have reduced those hips and I feel so well I want to shout. I never get out of breath now. When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy. I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Too Thin? You can be round, plump, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be, why should you not?

A pupil who was thin writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounding out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I want it, and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested I feel so well all the time."

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you.

Are Your EYES Normal?

If not, use

THE IDEAL SIGHT RESTORER

for 15 days at our expense.

THE NORMAL EYE

It helps Nature in a purely natural way to strengthen the eyes and restore the natural vision. Its action is in the nature of a gentle massage, which stimulates the eyes by restoring the normal circulation of blood—that is all that weak eyes require. But it does more—it moulds the eye painlessly but surely to its perfect shape. This is necessary to correct near-sight, far-sight, astigmatism, and kindred defects. It is absolutely safe—it does not come in direct contact with the eyes; and five minutes' manipulation, in your own home, twice a day, is all that is necessary to counteract eyestrain and headache, and relegate eyeglasses to the rubbish box. Throw away your eyeglasses. See nature, and read with your naked eyes. Write for instructive booklet and 15 days test to THE IDEAL CO., 321 H 5th Ave., N.Y.

Questions and Answers

M. A. S., Northport, L. I. Please mention the difference between Pantheism and Christianity?

Pantheism teaches that God or the divine principle is in nature and all around us and in ourselves, and rejects the conception of a personal God, a spiritual Being who rules the universe.

A., Martins Ferry, O. Some time ago I noticed an article in regard to comets. When I was a boy (about 1859 or 1860), we had an extra large comet visible. The people expected it to fall. I know we were afraid to go to bed at nights; it seemed so near the earth and so threatening.

In 1858 Donati's comet visited our sky with a trail of blazing splendor. Its presence terrified superstitious people and persons ignorant of astronomy. Many believed it to be a special messenger sent to rebuke our sinful world. Another comet of great size lighted our sky in 1860 and another in 1861. These, however, were seen by fewer people, for the reason that they came into our field of vision late in the night. The comet of 1861 was so near us that our earth passed through the tail of it. The only effect was a phosphorescent mist in our atmosphere.

SAMUEL PHELPS LELAND.

G. J., Kingfisher, Okla. Did John D. Rockefeller pay the fine imposed on the Standard Oil of $29,000,000?

The fine was not collected and the judgment was nullified on appeal.

A. S. C., Fearis, Ky. 1. What are we to understand by "If a man smite thee on one side (cheek) turn to him the other"?

It means that Christ's followers are not to use carnal weapons nor to resort to law, but to be meek and forgiving, and suffer wrong and loss rather than wrangle and quarrel in bitterness of heart and enmity against their fellows. We are told that where a brother offends we are to forgive him; and again, where one, after being warned, still persists in offending, and becomes absolutely incorrigible and indifferent to rebuke, then we are to let him be to us as a stranger (see Matt. 18 : 15, 16, 17).

S. E. R., Pentwater, Mich. 1. What is the moral in the Raven, if there be any? 2. Who were the six hundred in "The Charge of the Light Brigade"? 3. From which Longfellow's poem is the following taken:

"Be noble, and the nobleness that lies
In other men, sleeping, but never dead,
Will rise in majesty to meet thine own."

1. We do not know that Poe intended to teach any moral in particular in the poem. 2. The light brigade which made the famous charge of the "six hundred" at Balaklava, on the 26th of September, 1854, was under the command of Lord Cardigan. He was ordered to charge the Russian army, which had reformed on its own ground with the artillery in front. Lord Lucan, it is said, ordered Cardigan to go forward on a misconception of an order issued by the commander, Lord Raglan. The light cavalry dragoons and lancers swept up to the Russian position, under a terrific fire, sabred the cannoneers and attacked the infantry. Only 198 returned from the attack out of the 670 who made it. 3. It was not written by Longfellow, but by Lowell. You will find the lines in his Fourth Sonnet.

Referring to a question and answer in a recent issue asking the name of the bright star south of the square of Pegasus, D. D., Elkhart, Ind., states that it is the planet Saturn, which is "now in the zodiacal constellation Pisces, and is about fifteen degrees directly south and in line with the two stars Alpheratz in Andromeda, and Algenib in Pegasus. A little east of the centre of the square of Pegasus, he is of a copperish color, looks smooth and round, and does not twinkle. The first magnitude star Altair is about sixty degrees west of him." Since this was written the planet has moved to the east, but he can be easily found with a common field-glass. G. B., Superior, Wis. A thinks that amusements and sports on the Sabbath are wrong, but he says that he would not think anyone had sinned, if such person thought himself doing right. B says A should not have made this last statement, as it puts the Sabbath breaker on a level with the Sabbath observer.

A's view is simply the result of an unenlightened conscience. In worldly affairs, ignorance of the law is no excuse for violating it. In religion, ignorance (like that of the heathen) is taken into account, but where the individual knows the moral law and perversely misconstrues it, it must be set down either to moral obliquity, an uneducated conscience or deliberate wickedness.

Washington, D. C., Jan. 4, 1909.

DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,
Bible House, New York.

Your generous response to the appeal for funds to relieve the necessities of the Italian Earthquake Sufferers in forwarding at once another advance of THIRTY THOUSAND DOLLARS, to complete the necessary one hundred and sixty thousand to send a relief ship from Genoa to the stricken zone, has caused the deepest gratitude here. At the Red Cross Headquarters this morning, Miss Boardman said that the American Committee at Rome appealed to the American Red Cross for funds to send the relief ship. After a consultation between President Roosevelt, Secretary Root, and Assistant Secretary Bacon last night, it was decided to cable the money. The three distinguished men in consultation were sure that you, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, would help, and your ready response justified their belief. Miss Boardman added, "The National Red Cross greatly appreciates the prompt action of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in advancing the Thirty Thousand Dollars to complete the amount needed for the ship of relief. It is most timely, and is a generosity for which the Red Cross feels especially grateful to Dr. Klopsch and the generous givers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

Secretary Bacon said: "Will you say to Dr. Klopsch and the generous constituency of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, that President Roosevelt, the Department of State, and the National Red Cross, appreciate most fully the Wonderful generosity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the advancement of this thirty thousand dollars, IN ADDITION TO THE TWENTY THOUSAND DOLLARS already sent, is a gift, the value of which is doubled by its timeliness. Personally, I have not the words to express my feeling of gratitude. Dr. Klopsch and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have again proven benefactors of world-wide fame."

"I have just been informed of your additional contribution of Thirty Thousand Dollars for the sufferers of Sicily and Calabria. Your charity is endless. I have no words to praise it and to convey to you all my personal gratitude, to which, I am convinced, correspond the feelings of His Majesty's Government, and of the people of Italy. Excuse the brevity of these lines. I know you by your work and am desirous to know you personally. Perhaps oral language will be more eloquent than written to express to you all my heartfelt thanks." A. G. BAKER.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Italian Earthquake Fund is now open for contributions. Send in YOUR gift, however small. Save ONE life; relieve ONE starving family. Let it be as liberal as your heart prompts and your means permit. Above all, SEND IT QUICKLY, for thousands are perishing. Every Gift will be acknowledged in these columns. Address all Contributions

Jews at the "Wailing Place," Outside the Temple Grounds

A Jerusalem Hebrew

THE SULTAN'S BOON TO THE JEWS

FOR the first time in many centuries, the Jews of Jerusalem were admitted without escort to the sacred enclosure where the temple formerly stood, on "Constitution Day," July 24 last. This historic event is confirmed by a cable dispatch from Hon. Thomas R. Wallace, United States Consul-General in Jerusalem. On the day which marked the granting of a new Constitution to all who live under the Sultan's rule, this great and long-wished-for boon came to the children of Abraham most unexpectedly, and was hailed with genuine satisfaction. It marks the beginning of a new era in the political and religious status of the Jew in his native land, where, ever since the Moslem conquest in 637 A.D., he has been buffeted and oppressed, denied the smallest privileges, excluded from the temple grounds and made to feel that he was the meanest subject of all who dwelt in the once glorious city of David, now the chief town of a Turkish province, governed by a Pasha, and garrisoned by the soldiers of the Sultan.

While the long succession of wars to which Jerusalem has been subjected has obliterated most of the ancient landmarks, the temple site has been changed but little in the passing generations. To the Mohammedans, the site is known as "El Haram esh Sherif" (the Noble Sanctuary). Within the enclosed area is the "Kubbet es Sakrah," or "Dome of the Rock," which is one of the most beautiful buildings in the Holy City, and occupies about one-seventh of the total area enclosed. The entire grounds are surrounded by a wall, with entrances only on the north and west, and access is secured on application to some high official, or—in the case of strangers—to a consul. Moslems, Jews and Christians unite in their veneration for this enclosure, and feel that they are treading upon holy ground. It is the place, writes Professor G. Robinson Lees, "where the Almighty shed forth his glory in the Shekinah; where our Saviour was presented by his mother, and where he as a man worshiped his Heavenly Father." With Bethlehem and Calvary, it will ever be enshrined in Christian hearts as one of the three places that recall the dearest memories of Christ's earthly sojourn.

Although the "Dome of the Rock" has become widely known to travelers as the Mosque of Omar, the title is misleading. It is not a mosque, but a shrine or place of pilgrimage. It was erected by Caliph Abd-el-Melek in 691 A.D., to replace the wooden structure built by Omar as a pilgrim shelter. It is of Persian or Byzantine design, and its columns, bases and capitals probably were taken from some other temple destroyed at an earlier date. It is thought not improbable that some of them had formed part of the famous temple of Herod.

When the Crusaders captured Jerusalem, conceiving that this was the original temple, they built in it great altars, adorned its walls with pictures and set up a large jeweled cross. These, with the exception of the altars, were removed by Sultan Saladin, when the Moslems retook the city. The cross was ignominiously dragged through the streets. According to Moslem tradition, the sacred rock in the Kubbet es Sakrah fell from heaven. They believe it to mark the centre of the world, and upon it the angel Israfel will stand at the resurrection, to blow the last trumpet. The rock is supposed by some to be the site of the Holy of Holies of Solomon's Temple, and by others to be the foundation of the altar of burnt offering. Beneath the rock is a cavern with a subterranean passage, in which are two Christian altars, which are said to mark the praying places of David and Solomon.

Near the Bab-el-Jenneh (Door of Paradise), one of the entrances, is a dark-colored marble pavement, which tradition states was the cover of the tomb of Solomon and also the praying place of Elijah.

In the Sacred Temple Enclosure, to Which Jews are Now Admitted

To the left of the Dome of the Rock, and also within the temple grounds, is a smaller dome, called the "Dome of the Chain," which was built by Caliph Abd-el-Melek in 691 A.D. Arabic writers say that it marks the spot where, during the early days of Israel, "there hung down a chain that gave judgment (as to truth or lying) between them." Easily grasped by one who spoke the truth, it could not be touched by one who gave false witness. In the Middle Ages, this smaller dome was believed to mark the site of the tomb of St. James.

To the Jews, however, the temple grounds possess a more sacred significance than they do to any other nation. The sacred record states that "Solomon began to build the house of the Lord at Jerusalem in Mount Moriah, where the Lord appeared unto David his father, in the place that David had prepared in the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite" (II. Chron. 3:1). There can be little doubt that the central building — the temple — occupied the summit where the Mosque of Omar now stands. The Jews still recall its glories and sigh and lament over their loss with a tenacity that has not been diminished with the passage of time. Their love of the temple is an undying love, without a parallel in the history of any other race. Now that their long exclusion is at an end, and they can enter freely those hallowed precincts, Jerusalem will no doubt possess a more powerful fascination for them than ever.

A writer thus describes a familiar scene among the Hebrews resident in the Holy City. On stated days they go to the temple wall, and, standing on the outside of the enclosure, bewail the sad lot of their race.

"Between eighty and one hundred were there—persons of every age, from the old white-bearded patriarch with shriveled features and piping voice, to the melancholy boy of twelve. It was a touching sight. Israel was weeping over her ruined temple, her ruined city, her ruined Church, her people scattered. Often there were low murmurs and sobs; some would approach the wall as if to embrace it; others would actually kiss its ancient stones. We acknowledge that we had never been so impressed with the deep humiliation of the Jews, as when we thus saw them weeping as down-trodden strangers in their own Jerusalem, and beholding in that Mosque of Omar, not far off, 'mockery sitting on their own Salem's towers.'"

THE BATTLE FOR WOMAN SUFFRAGE

By LYMAN BEECHER STOWE

THEORETICAL discussions about woman suffrage remind one of the argument in Alice in Wonderland, as to whether the Cheshire cat could be beheaded. One side asserted that since she had a head, of course she could be beheaded; the other, that since she had no body, of course she could not be beheaded. The anti-suffragists claim that, in a free country, the ballot should not be forced upon unwilling women; the suffragists maintain that in a free country the ballot should not be withheld from willing women.

It is a frequent popular assertion that, while the movement for women's education and property rights has increased rapidly, the suffrage movement has made little progress. Let us measure the accuracy of this statement by the facts. Seventy years ago, women had the suffrage to a very limited extent in Sweden, and in one or two other portions of the old world. In all other parts of the old world, and in all parts of the new, they were entirely without it. To-day, in Tasmania, New Zealand, Queensland (Australia) and Finland women have full suffrage on the same terms as men; and in the last two countries are eligible for Parliament. In Norway, women have complete suffrage, with a trifling property qualification. In Sweden and Iceland, they vote for all officials except members of Parliament. In Denmark they do the same. In New South Wales they have State suffrage. In England, where they have long voted for all officials except members of Parliament, they were last year made eligible, by an almost unanimous vote of Parliament, for public office, as mayors, aldermen, county and town councilors. Last month the British Ministry pledged themselves to introduce into the present Parliament, before the expiration of its term two years hence, a bill granting women complete national suffrage.

Now let us turn to our own country, where women, seventy years ago, had no suffrage of any description anywhere. American women now have complete suffrage on the same terms as men in Wyoming, Colorado, Utah and Idaho; municipal suffrage in Kansas; tax-payers' suffrage in four States, and school suffrage in twenty-six States and Territories. Thirty-five States and Territories now have some form of woman suffrage. Men to-day of the age of Dr. Edward Everett Hale might recall the time when such a thing as woman suffrage in any form was unknown within our borders. This is the story the facts tell.

We are a practical people. We have a wholesome respect for the opinions of "practical men." Realizing this, I first questioned the practical politicians, who know woman suffrage as a fact and not a theory, the practical politicians, who represent in Congress Wyoming, Colorado, Utah and Idaho. I will briefly give their views.

Senator Warren, of Wyoming, said: "I notice the press is waking up to the fact that this subject is coming to be a live wire. We have had woman suffrage in Wyoming for thirty-nine years. It worked well from the start. It has so long been the natural order of things that it is difficult to imagine the State without it. Practically all opposition to it subsided many years ago. Women vote and interest themselves intelligently in public affairs in as large proportion as do men. They fill adequately such public offices as they are fitted for, and they have never attempted to secure those for which they are not fitted. The office of State Superintendent of Public Instruction has now for four years been admirably administered by a woman. Many of the county superintendents of schools, county clerks and treasurers are women. They also hold a large number of clerkships."

The Senator went on to explain how it came to be adopted. In 1869, when Wyoming was still a Territory, a bill granting the suffrage to women was passed by the Legislature, partially to advertise the Territory and partially as a joke on the Democratic Governor. It was thought he would feel obliged to veto it, and would thereby be embarrassed. The Governor did not veto it, and the next year he turned the tables on the legislative jokesters by vetoing their bill to withdraw the franchise from the women.

There are two ways to secure woman suffrage:

First, the legislature of each State can submit the question to the voters and, if it receives the necessary majority, the women of that State are enfranchised. Second, the Congress of the United States by a two-thirds majority can refer the question to the legislatures of all the States, and, when three-fourths of these have ratified it, the women of the entire country will be enabled to vote on exactly the same terms as men.

Senator Warren believes the first method is the one to which the woman suffrage leaders should devote all their energies. He holds it manifestly impossible at present to secure an amendment to the Constitution for enfranchising women, or for any other purpose, and hence looks upon the attempt as a waste of energy.

Next I saw Senator Teller of Colorado. He said: "We have had woman suffrage in our State since 1893. If the question were resubmitted to the voters to-day, the opposition to it would be negligible. I did not myself approve it until I saw it operating beneficially in Wyoming Territory. Wyoming's experience largely influenced Colorado in adopting it. Both our State and county superintendents of schools are now, as a matter of custom, always women. Women are administering these offices with marked ability—better than did the men who preceded them. Judge Lindsey, of the Juvenile Court in Denver, probably could not have been re-elected had it not been for the work the women did for him and the votes they gave him. The women do the most good, however, in the nominating conventions. The conventions dare not put men of bad character on the tickets, because they know the women won't vote for them. For instance, it would be impossible for a man who drank to excess to be elected to any office in our State, now that the women vote.

"It works as well in Denver, with its over 200,000 inhabitants, as in the country districts. The order and decency at the polling places has been greatly increased since women went to the polls. The men of Colorado gave the suffrage to the women without the latter making any particular effort to secure it. We have just elected a woman to our Legislature. Women have in the past served in the Legislature with full as much credit and ability as men. Woman suffrage with us has produced none of the evils which its opponents predicted."

Representative French, of Idaho, confessed that he had not been in favor of woman suffrage at the time it was adopted by his State in 1896. From practical experience with it, however, he has become a convert. He believes it has raised the moral tone of political life throughout the State, particularly in county politics. Forty per cent. of the voters are women. They are much more independent than the men. They won't vote the straight ticket unless they approve the individual candidates. They are free from blind party loyalty, which sometimes leads men to vote for a man whose record is bad, simply because he is on their party ticket. Mr. French believes there is a probability that the State of Washington may adopt woman suffrage next year. While he quite agrees with Senator Warren that a constitutional amendment is out of the question at present, he thinks it should be continually urged, because of the educational value of such an effort.

Senator Sutherland, of Utah, said: "I am in favor of woman suffrage as a result of observing its practical operation in our State during the past twelve years. We have had it since we were admitted to Statehood, in 1896. It has raised the whole tone of our politics. As large a proportion of women as of men vote. They never split on sex lines. It has never tended in the slightest degree to create a sex party. Women have taken a particularly keen and useful interest in our educational affairs. They have never tried to fill offices for which they were not fitted. It has been just as beneficial in Salt Lake City as in the rural districts. Women are more apt than men to 'scratch' a bad man, who may be running on an otherwise good ticket. The straight ticket has no such hold over them as it has over male voters." Senator Sutherland believes it is the opposition of women, more than that of men, which retards the spread of woman suffrage.

Senator Borah, of Idaho, agrees with the others that woman suffrage has raised the moral tone of politics. The Superintendent of Public Instruction in Idaho, as in Colorado, is now always a woman. Most of the county treasurers are also women. While a good many of the cultivated women of the State do not want the suffrage, they nevertheless, as a matter of civic duty, vote and do their part in public affairs. There are few who carry their opposition to the point of refusing to vote, now that they have the right. This is interesting, in view of the argument so widely circulated here in the East, that educated women would not vote, even were they given the right. The assumption that they have less conscience about their civic duties than their sisters in Idaho is neither fair nor generous.

Senator Borah says that while woman suffrage in Idaho has not produced all the reforms its advocates predicted, it has resulted in none of the evils its opponents threatened. There have been not the faintest symptoms of any such evils. It does not break up homes. It does not unsex the women. It does not drag woman out of her sphere. It does not make a sex party. Even campaign orators never appeal to the women voters as such. It has forced the parties to be more particular about the moral character of their candidates. Senator Borah thinks the suffrage leaders should devote their chief energies to winning over the individual States.

Representative Cook, of Colorado, gave much the same report of woman suffrage in his State as did Senator Teller. He said the women were much more dependable than were the men in supporting a measure after agreeing to do so. This is due in part, no doubt, to the fact that they are not "in politics," and hence not influenced by so many ulterior considerations. They support a measure on its merits, as they see them, regardless of "political log-rolling" considerations. Mr. Cook said: "As large a proportion of our women as men vote. Woman suffrage has developed none of the objectionable activities among women which anti-suffragists seem to fear. I believe the suffrage leaders should urge an amendment to the Federal Constitution and should work with the various States at the same time."

I next talked with Senator Burrows, of Michigan—a State where women have the school suffrage only. Senator Burrows said: "I believe in woman suffrage on principle. There is no legitimate reason why women should not vote. To attempt to secure a constitutional amendment at the present time is impracticable. The best course to pursue is to fight it out, State by State, until a majority of the States have been won over. Then there would be a reasonable chance of carrying the amendment in Congress by the necessary two-thirds majority, and in such case it would probably be possible to secure its ratification by three-quarters of the States."

Senator Fulton, of Oregon, said he had always favored woman suffrage, and had twice, while in the Legislature, presented an amendment to the State Constitution for that purpose. The question has been voted on in Oregon four times during the past thirty years. The last time was last June, when it went before the voters by referendum and was decisively but not overwhelmingly defeated. The

America Joins in Work to Relieve the Earthquake Sufferers and to Fight Famine and Pestilence

View of Calabrian Coast, Where Most of the People Perished

Catania, Where Thousands of Wounded and Starving Have Taken Refuge

EVERY civilized country has been deeply stirred by the appalling loss of life in the recent earthquake in Italy, and offers of aid as well as sympathy are pouring in from Europe and America. National, State and city governments have telegraphed sympathy and offers of assistance. The generous heart of the American people was deeply touched when the wide extent of this disaster—the greatest in modern times—became known, and action was at once taken by organizations and individuals to do something toward mitigating the distress of thousands of homeless people, who have lost all, in many instances home, relatives, friends and even their own reason.

Dr. Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at once cabled on behalf of his readers the following telegram to the King of Italy:

"His Majesty Victor Emmanuel, Rome:

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is advancing by cable, through the State Department in Washington, twenty thousand dollars for relief. We hope to do much more. America's heart deeply sympathizes with Your Majesty in this dreadful, inscrutable dispensation of Providence.

"LOUIS KLOPSCH,
"Proprietor."

Dr. Klopsch also sent a telegram to His Excellency the Italian Ambassador in Washington, informing him that twenty thousand dollars had already been sent, and that much more would follow, and offering heartfelt sympathy to the King and his stricken people. Dr. Klopsch also informed Mr. Taft, at Atlanta, Ga., as head of the American Red Cross, of his intention to aid the sufferers. The American Ambassador, Mr. Griscom, was also communicated with. The Italian Ambassador in Washington, on hearing of the gift advanced by Dr. Klopsch in behalf of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, sent the following telegram:

"DR. KLOPSCH, NEW YORK:

"It will be my duty to notify my King and country of your splendid generosity. Accept my sincerest and warmest thanks, on behalf of the sufferers you relieve.

"AMBASSADOR DES PLANCHES."

His Excellency cordially received a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who called at the embassy in connection with the relief fund. He was completely overcome, tears came to his eyes, and he asked his caller to tell Dr. Klopsch that no words could express the appreciation of the Italian people. He had heard of the philanthropies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, its readers and its proprietor, but he had not dreamed of their extending aid to his poor afflicted people.

We were able to give only a brief account of the disaster in a part of last week's issue, as the edition was already on the press. More complete information has now come to hand, showing that without doubt the number of lives lost in this cataclysm of nature will go far beyond the hundred thousand mark, and it would not be at all surprising, when the full facts are known, to find that two hundred thousand were blotted out by the earthquake, the walls of falling buildings and the great tidal wave which swept in from the sea almost before the earth had ceased to heave and tremble in its gigantic efforts to readjust itself to some change made beneath its surface.

Italy is shaped much like a boot, with its toe placed against a rock. Calabria, the toe of the boot, and the rock, the picturesque island of Sicily, are the districts in which the shocks were greatest and in which the appalling loss of life occurred. The rest of the boot, however, was shaken with lighter tremors, which were felt as far north as the Italian Alps.

Most of the refugees from the stricken districts are yet unable to speak with any degree of composure of the scenes of horror through which they have passed and which heralded, they were convinced at the time, the end of the world. The first shock came early on the morning of December 28, while the people were yet in bed, and there was still no sign of daylight in the east. Then several shocks followed in rapid succession, each one lasting about thirty-two seconds. All telegraphic communication was at once lost with the outside world, and it was late in the day before officers of torpedo boats, steaming up the west coast of Italy for help, were able to find a telegraph station from which Rome and the rest of Italy could be informed concerning what had happened in Calabria and Sicily.

The cities of Messina and Reggio suffered the most; the former is in ruins, and the latter has nearly disappeared. Dozens of smaller cities, villages and hamlets were in great part destroyed and the dead lie in thousands beneath the ruins. From one place no news came, and a searching party found the reason later when it was discovered that all of the inhabitants were dead beneath the fallen walls of their homes.

In the former beautiful city of Messina there is hardly a house that does not lie in ruins. It was a little after five in the morning when the first shock came. The earth seemed to rise for a moment and then fall away. The town hall and the largest hotel split from top to bottom, but did not at first cave in, though in the latter many of the guests were thrown through the yawning gaps in the floors and killed. The cathedral was wrecked, and the fronts of the houses along entire streets fell forward to the roadway, as if dashed down by unseen hands. and the people were precipitated down to the lower floors and in some instances clear into the streets. In an instant the city was in an uproar, falling walls, the rending of timbers, the shrieks of the people mingled in an indescribable pandemonium. All who could made their way into the streets. Some who retained their self-possession to any degree tried to rescue their families, but before anything could be done other shocks followed and the weakened walls that were still standing fell in on the people below, the grinding of brick and stone as it rushed downward to earth, making a deafening roar which drowned out for a moment the cries and shrieks of the people. The crowds, barefooted and in their nightclothes, ran hither and thither as cries of warning or of appeal echoed first from one quarter and then another. Some with the energy born of despair tried again and again to lift the wreckage of their homes and rescue their loved ones, whose voices called to them in agony or appeal from below. The sky seemed black as ink, and rain and sleet beat down upon the ruined city, but while it added to the discomfiture of the hapless people it was insufficient to extinguish the flames which began to burst out among the ruins, and soon laid a large area in ashes.

Amid the horror of it all many went stark mad, and ran laughing and shrieking from street to street until they fell exhausted among the heaps of dead or escaped to the country, where they were found. Searching parties found them wandering about, unable to tell who they were or where they had lived.

In the lower part of the city the tidal wave rose soon after the quake and caused the loss of thousands. In the straits the water rose like a wall to the height of about nine feet, and then swept shoreward to fill in the depression caused by the subsidence of the coast land. The fishing boats simply disappeared. The large ships in the harbor were hurled against one another, the smaller going to the bottom in a twinkling of an eye. Others were dashed against the quays, and both ships and docks were reduced to unrecognizable beams, twisted iron and timber. And on went the wave, apparently gaining strength as it went up into the town for a thousand feet, and as at no point was it lower than a man's armpits, hundreds were drowned. The receding waters carried out to sea masts, broken hulls, boats turned bottom up, and the light parts of houses which it had gathered in its sweep into the city.

Professor Palermo, of the University of Messina, who managed to escape, said: "We passed through streets that felt as if they were the bottom of valleys or climbed heights which were all that remained of the finest palaces of Messina. I will never forget it as long as I live."

Reggio, across the straits from Messina, exists only as a heap of rubbish, in which lie the bodies of thousands who went to bed the night before as as light-hearted as any in all Italy.

One message to Rome, from some telegraph station in Calabria, told in few words what would greet the doctors and troops who were hurrying to help: "Reggio has been almost entirely destroyed. The directors of telegraph and the operators dead. Messina looks like Pompeii."

The Prefect was one of the few who escaped, but was unable to tell much of the disaster. He said he had walked through thirty-six miles of wrecked villages, in which no living soul was seen. From others it was learned that the people were awakened by deafening explosions, the city seemed to sink and the sea rushed over it, flooding it to a depth of thirty feet. One survivor said he saw the water strike the cathedral and pass over its roof. The ferryboat from Messina was half way across to Reggio when the waters opened and the boat went down until the officers are sure it touched bottom, then it seemed lifted mountain high, to be again dashed downward. It escaped being wrecked, and at last reached the spot where Reggio had stood. "The entire place," said one passenger, "looked like a city which had lain for centuries in ruins. Clouds of dust floating far above made the place dark."

Bagnara, a place of 10,000 people, north of Reggio, is at this writing reported to be only a city of the dead. One survivor has been found, who said he lived there. Santa Eufemia, in the same district, lost 1,000. Seminaria, Calabria, its Mayor reports, has been wiped out, a handful of people left from 4,000. Most of the villages about Reggio were shaken, the death list being nearly 4,000. At Monteleone gas explosions followed the earthquake, and at least 2,000 people were reported dead. Cassano and Cozenza suffered severely.

The King of Italy went at once to Messina, accompanied by his beautiful Queen, to render all aid possible. Doctors and nurses were sent by steamers and special trains, yet the suffering and distress is so great that Italy needs the help of her sister nations in this hour of dire need. With so many unburied bodies it would seem as if an outbreak of pestilence would certainly follow. The people are without clothing and without food. Thousands are on the verge of starvation. Reports have come in of villagers sleeping in caves or in the forests, and scraping the bark off trees to appease their hunger—the only food procurable.

Senator attributes this defeat largely to the activities of the anti-suffrage women.

Senator Bourne, of Oregon, also favors suffrage for women, and did what he could to aid the women who conducted the unsuccessful campaign of last June.

In its territorial days Washington admitted women to the suffrage, but the Supreme Court of the Territory finally declared it unconstitutional. Even after this decision, the women, on advice of counsel, kept on voting and serving on juries just as formerly. Finally a man was indicted by a grand jury upon which there sat a woman. The man's attorney claimed that the woman rendered the jury an illegal body and the indictment void. He finally found a judge who supported this contention and set aside the indictment. In Territories, the judges need not, as in States, be residents. The decision marked the end of woman suffrage in Washington. This experiment, however, served the purpose of showing that women are entirely competent to perform jury duty. The contention that they are not competent for such duty has always been one of the arguments for excluding them from the suffrage.

Of the ten Congressmen with whom I talked, eight favored woman suffrage without reservation, one favored it on principle, and one declined to commit himself. Before I started in a friend in Washington told me I could "rake Congress with a fine-tooth comb without finding three Congressmen who approved it."

Objectors may say that since the majority of the expressions here given are from Congressmen representing States where women vote, their testimony may be discounted on the ground of self-interested bias. This objection might have some weight had these gentlemen simply expressed their favorable opinions in vague and general terms. Since, however, they have in each case given perfectly definite and specific grounds for their views, it falls to the ground, unless we are to attribute to our national representatives a degree of cowardly subservience which would render valueless their views on all live issues. Furthermore, these are the Congressmen who are qualified to speak authoritatively on this question. They are the ones whose views are based on facts and not theories.

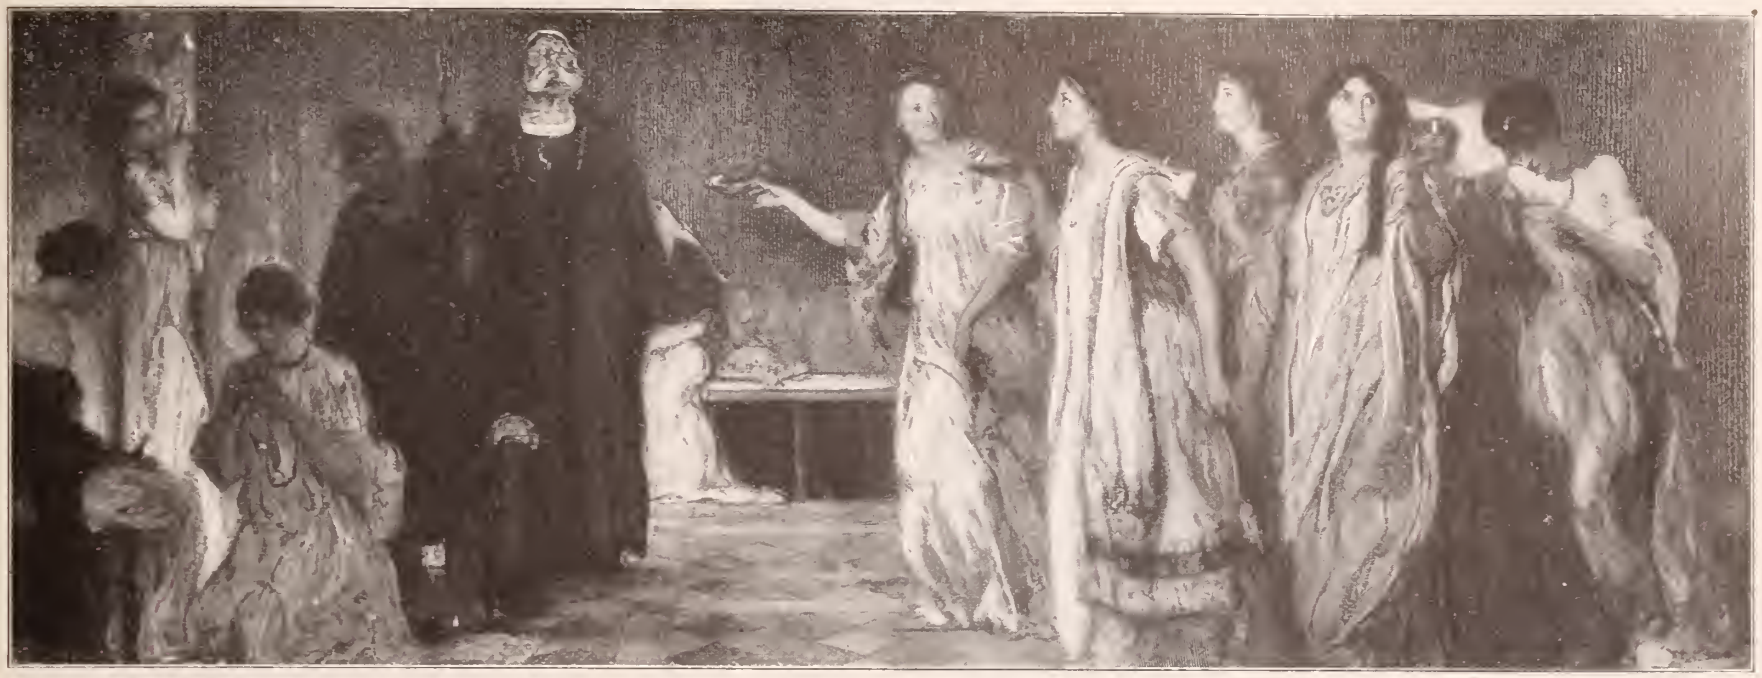
A NEGRO ARTIST'S TRIUMPH



"Behold, the Bridegroom Cometh" — The Famous Painting by Tanner

THE American Art Association recently exhibited for two weeks at their galleries at Madison Square, New York, a series of very remarkable religious paintings, the work of Mr. Henry O. Tanner, a young American artist, whose talent has won him high recognition in the European art world. The subjects of these pictures are Biblical and the scenes are depicted by the use of local types, customs, costumes and other accessories. In every picture the fervor of religious feeling comes out very impressively.

Since the Orient has not materially changed, the Palestine of to-day vividly recalls the days when Jesus lived and taught. An artist who is gifted with the powers of insight and interpretation can transfer to his canvas the peculiar atmosphere of that clime. Tanner studied life on the spot in Jerusalem, Bethlehem and other sacred places. Some of his paintings were executed in the Holy Land. A mystical flavor, a tone of reverence, a suggestiveness of the spiritual, an eagerness of faith, mark his work to a unique degree.

One of the most impressive canvases in this collection is that entitled "Behold, the Bridegroom Cometh." It is ten feet high by fifteen feet long, and the masses of light and shade are admirably arranged. The background is spacious, picturesque and suggestive of the festal occasion. The crier is vociferously heralding the approach of the nuptial procession, whose presence is made known by the light in the distance. The virgins are in the foreground. Their faces are a study in expression and character. Gaiety and sadness, delight and despair, expectation and disappointment are shown in contrast in the countenances and demeanor of the wise and the foolish. A spirit of sympathy is shown by two of the fortunate ones for the fate of their sisters in dismay. One in the group on the right is holding out her lamp, so that it may help the flickering light of her companion in distress. On the left is another on her knees; her well-trimmed lamp is beside her, while she is trying to help her distracted sister who is seated, even at the risk of missing the festivity herself. The artist has caught the spirit of the parable, and his painting is a strong sermon.

He is very happy in depicting night scenes. "Daniel in the Lions' Den" is one of his earliest pictures. The darkness and dread of the surroundings, together with the air of mystery, are forcefully conveyed. In the picture, the "Death of Judas," we see the dark and lonely spot where the traitor made an end of himself. Two peasants are walking along, unconscious that the next turn in the road will show a scene to startle and horrify them. The awfulness of the tragedy is suggested with dramatic vividness. "The Disciples See Christ Walking on the Sea" is another canvas, which teaches more by suggestion than by explanation. "Christ and Nicodemus" shows the two figures seated on the stone roof of a Jerusalem house. By the light of the moon, the sleeping city is seen in the distance. In the room below a lamp is burning, and its ray of light falls on the breast of Jesus. His garb is that of an Oriental teacher; the black hair and beard lend to the face an ascetic hue.

With reverence and tenderness Tanner gives another conception of Christ in his picture, "Christ Washing the Disciples' Feet." Standing on the right is Judas, the struggle going on in his soul as he witnesses the menial service of the Master. Peter is seated on his right, impatiently awaiting an opportunity to utter his vigorous protest. The speech seems ready to burst from his lips, yet he seems to be held back by reverence. Next to him is John, who looks at his companions in perplexity, provoked that their selfish stupidity should have precipitated this crisis. In the shadow is the Master, who seems to be looking toward Peter, while he is washing the feet of one of the disciples, who in shame hardly dares to look up.

Another of Tanner's paintings, owned by the French Government and hung in the Luxembourg, is entitled "The Two Disciples." Jesus is asking the blessing on the simple meal. His eyes are turned to heaven, his hands are clasped, his attitude is one of rapt devotion.

Henry Ossawa Tanner is a native American, the son of Bishop Benjamin T. Tanner, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. He was born in 1859. He studied at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts under Thomas Eakins. For three years he taught art at Clark University, Atlanta, Ga. He showed such great talent that a few friends encouraged him to go abroad. With their financial assistance he went to Paris, and soon distinguished himself as a pupil of Jean Paul Laurens and Benjamin Constant. From 1896, when his paintings received honorable mention in the French Salons, up to the time that the French Government purchased two of his paintings for the Luxembourg, his career has been a series of successes. He has won medals at the Paris Exposition of 1900 and the Pan-American Exposition of 1901; also the Walter Lippincott Prize, Philadelphia, in 1900, and the Harris Prize of Chicago. His paintings enrich the Wilstack Collection, Philadelphia; the Carnegie Institute, Pittsburg; the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, and the Chicago Art Institute. He has settled in Paris for professional purposes, and is there held in the highest honor by his fellow-craftsmen and the art-loving public. His two paintings which have been purchased by the French Government for the Luxembourg collection are entitled "The Resurrection of Lazarus" and "The Two Disciples." Here he is found in the company of distinguished American artists, among them Whistler and Sargent.

THE GOSPEL OF COMFORT

Text: II. Thes. 2:16, 17 (R.V.)

THE world is a place of need, and of all the needs of the needy world the greatest is that human hearts should find comfort. The word comfort means more than to soothe and console. It means originally to strengthen, to fortify, to bring support and courage; and naturally enough it has been narrowed down to the special meaning to bring solace and good cheer, to soothe some one in grief and trouble. We see the wide range of meaning in the word when we think that comfort is often used for the satisfaction of bodily needs, freedom from pain and care and trouble, a state of physical well-being, as in our common phrase "creature comforts." The true significance of the word is to get something which will give strength to endure under trial and to stablish men in every good work and word.

It is impossible to classify all the cares and troubles and necessities. They are past counting, and even the same sorrow creates different problems to different hearts. What is to enable us to meet the terrible uncertainties of life and its more terrible certainties, to master doubt and disarm fear, to carry burdens patiently and face death calmly? By what can we reach and maintain the equilibrium of life? What can give the victory over sorrow and pain, and is any victory possible? The one unfailing source of comfort in the Bible is God himself—faith in his love and grace. Only he can comfort hearts and stablish them. Indeed, the ultimate religious meaning of all trial is that through it men may be led or drawn to God and may learn his statutes and find peace under his shadow.

The Shipwreck of Faith

We cannot forget, however, that the very existence of human misery often leads men to the denial of God altogether. The great tragedy of the world has often brought to men the shipwreck of faith, and this is the greatest tragedy of all. How can God be possible and permit in his world the horrors we know, the deadly pestilence, the fierce tornado, the solid earth rent by earthquakes, the peaceful town buried by the volcano's molten lava, the desolation of war? This tragedy on the large scale has destroyed faith which could withstand even personal sorrow. Others again only realize that the problem exists when it strikes home to their own hearts. Only their own sore experience, their own anguish and pain, bring them to despair of God. With others, faith can survive both the thought of the world's tragedy in the mass and even personal misfortune, but it breaks down when they have to stand helpless before the suffering of those bound to them by all the ties of love.

Sooner or later, it comes to all of us, in one or other of its forms—the weight of the mystery of pain. Into every life the scarlet thread is woven. We have to be very dull of heart indeed, and blind of eye, if we are never touched by the infinite pathos of human life. To be convinced of it we do not need to wait for lurid pictures of the devastation of cities and countries. Life is steeped in sorrow. Pain and failure and grief and loss are all around us, if not within us, and the sorest plight on earth is to know the bitter problem without knowing the source of any real comfort, to know the burden and know nothing of a burden-bearer. We cannot walk the streets without seeing the stricken look on many a face and read a story in many eyes—the tell-tale windows of the soul.

Mr. Joseph Hatton recalled recently a pathetic incident that occurred to himself and William Black, the novelist. As they were about to sail for Liverpool from New York, a man rushed hurriedly on board with a basket of flowers in his hand and came up to William Black and said, "On my last voyage here I lost a little girl, and she was buried at sea in such and such a latitude. Now, sir, will you scatter these flowers upon the waves when you pass over that latitude?" Of course he willingly promised to do this. Very early, when it was still dark, long before anyone had risen, the two stole up on deck, and there, beneath the morning stars, they cast the father's flowers upon the daughter's vast and wandering grave. To all must come some time the breaking of the strongest ties, and all sometimes must be touched with pity for the pathos of life and with a sense of the vanity of all earthly pursuits. The world is made barer and poorer when we feel that all the loving interest in us and our doings and fortunes has gone out of life. "What shadows we are and what shadows we pursue!"

Surmounting Trials

In such a mood we can ask if it is worth while being stablished even in good works and words, and if any comfort could bring back again the old zest for life. What can brace us again for the conflict and make us accept calmly duty and destiny? What can dignify life and make it appear inherently great? Far more often the trial is simply the smallness and monotony of our daily interests, the disheartening uniformity, the petty pace at which life creeps from day to day. Sometimes small disappointments are harder even than a great sorrow; the pin-pricks of circumstances can goad some to madness who could bear with fortitude and dignity a great wound. Petty annoyances and little discomforts are often harder to bear than a heavy affliction. It is a common experience to find that, to some, small vexations are more trying than great ones. In both cases everything depends on our essential view of life, and that in turn depends on our view of God. The Christian life is not a matter of great and small. It becomes consistent and all of a piece when it is seen in the light of faith. And the Christian answer to all need or trial of whatever sort is simply this: "Our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God our Father, which loved us and gave us eternal comfort and good hope through grace, comfort your hearts and stablish them in every good work and word."

The only dignified alternative to faith in God as a source of comfort is the stoical attitude. The world can sometimes meet suffering with defiance or resignation, can refuse to bend even though it must break, can speak of the unconquerable soul even in the keenest pain or the deepest grief. Of a piece with this is the common advice to bury sorrow in the presence of duty and to brace oneself up for the stern realities of life. There is a great and blessed truth in this, that some comfort always comes to the man who turns from the thought of grief to daily duty. It is used wrongly when it is done bitterly or faithlessly, as an opiate to deaden pain and forget thought, as

> The sad mechanic exercise
> Like dull narcotics numbing pain.

It is a true word when duty is the fruit of faith, when men are stablished in every good work and word through the comfort of heart which comes from the sense of God's presence.

Seeking the Calmer Happiness

It might be thought, then, that here we have the true nepenthe, the cup of comfort to drown all sorrow. It might be thought that we can do without the comfort of heart of religion, the eternal comfort and good hope through grace, if we can only by some means stablish ourselves in every good work. We might do without religion and turn with defiance or resignation, according to our temperament, to what we know to be daily duty. The writer of Ecclesiastes came to this in one of his moods. Somewhat cynically he had been pursuing a train of thought suggested by death. He saw that without religious faith in a future life death levels man with the animal, however higher in faculty and intellect he may stand above the animal in life. Here at least, when they alike turn to dust, "a man has no pre-eminence over a beast." It is an argument of despair pointing to the futility of the high thoughts and high hopes of men, yet it is the only possible conclusion from such materialism as for the moment is contemplated by the writer. "That which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; as the one dieth, so dieth the other." The lesson to be drawn by a wise man is the lesson drawn ever from similar philosophy, that of a careful and prudent epicureanism with a stoic touch in it: "Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better than that a man should rejoice in his own works, for that is his portion." He does not recommend a wild and reckless grasp at what sources of enjoyment are afforded by our short life. That defeats itself, only shortens the time, and fills it with ennui and disgust. The best way is to seek the calmer happiness got from the simpler sources of human life, and among them the enjoyment of healthy labor, not worrying too much with the malady of thought, but accepting the good of the common lot of man, finding some content and joy in his own works.

We do not need to examine the poverty of such a scheme of life, and the weakness of such a foundation, to show that materialism of creed in the long run means materialism of life and that there is nothing to keep it from being of the grossest form. But accepting the undoubted truth that serious occupation is a source of happiness and of comfort, we may well ask if work itself can insure happiness and assuage grief. If so, it is strange that such a simple secret should be so often missed, and strange that even the workers themselves should seek to escape from it to what they imagine the better lot of idleness. The fact is that work itself does not bring happiness. Without it happiness is impossible, but alone it brings weariness and a sense of futility. The writer of Ecclesiastes himself again and again speaks of its vanity. "What profit hath he that worketh in that wherein he laboreth?" As a matter of fact, no wise man can be satisfied with his own work, to say nothing of its satisfying his life. The man who looks on what he does complacently has a very meagre standard of excellence. Even if it satisfied his needs of outward activity, there remains the whole region of his inward life. If that be left, it is only a counsel of despair to recommend ceaseless industry to fill up the void. There will creep in the haunting doubt as to whether it is worth while going on merely as a machine. We need to feel that our work is worth doing, that it is accomplishing something, and that in following the line of duty we are also in line with something bigger. We need to have our activities related to the larger life of the world, and this faith alone does. It turns work into duty, giving it a secure motive. It relates our life to God, and makes us sure in simple trust that neither he nor the laws of our nature will play us false. The twin secrets of the source of happiness and peace are faith and duty—simple faith in God, in his love and justice, and simple duty whose motive is in that loving faith.

The weakness of thinking that we can find surcease of sorrow without finding any inward comfort is seen when we think of those who cannot work or whose work is distasteful by temperament. What, for example, of the man struck down by weakness, as must happen some time to all? What about the bitterness of being laid aside, and no longer able to work, when the loom must stop though the web be but half finished? It is all very well to speak of the relief which work brings to sorrow, how a man can forget grief in his labor, and it is true that it stanches the wound for the time at least. To the man who faces duty bravely, and will not give in to self-repining, the doing of duty does bring some repose of soul. But what when a man is cut off from his interests and occupations, and loses the happiness which he found in activity? The sick man is held in a chain which he cannot break, and if there was nothing else in his life but the surface happiness brought by his ways of employing himself, then he is indeed to be pitied. If you say that whatever befalls there will always remain the joy of performing natural duty, the peace and content of doing something, and that should suffice, even that refuge will be taken from you. Somewhere on the road of life you will be met by some calamity or weakness, when you, too, will be stricken like the strongest. It may be early or late—early, as with Romanes, cut off in the midst of his busy scientific work, to review again the whole foundations of faith and life, or like Amiel, to whom the terror of the invalid life was that it meant an end of everything but waiting, and whose pitiful cry on his deathbed was, "I cannot work"—or late, as with Carlyle, the last years of whose life were darkened by the loss of the power of writing, and to whom

POE, THE "POET OF SHADOWS"

NINETEEN hundred and nine will be hardly less memorable than the year just closed for the number of historic and literary anniversaries. The first one to be observed will be the centennial of the birth of Edgar Allan Poe, who may be justly called the father of the American short story. As his life was connected with both the North and the South, the nineteenth of the month, his natal day, will be celebrated in several of the places which for more or less brief periods he called home. His writings and his life reflect much light on each other. As he excelled as a writer of short mystic romances, so his own brief career was a romance, far removed from the ordinary paths traveled by his fellow-men. It was filled with dark shadows, and the sunny places were so few and far between as to be scarcely noticeable. Success, while he lived, seemed to stand at a far distance and mock his most earnest desires to make a successful career in literature. Posterity has been more kind, and has given him a place among the immortals. His fame has spread far beyond his own country, and the literary men of France, who have in great part adopted his style and methods, gratefully acknowledged their indebtedness to him.

Poe came of a good family. He was born in Boston, Mass., in 1809, when his parents were far from being in comfortable circumstances. His father, David Poe, Jr., had married Elizabeth Arnold, a young Englishwoman, against the wishes of his family, which harshly disowned him, and left the young people to make their own way in the world. This way proved hard for the devoted young couple, and both the father and the mother died in 1811, in Richmond, Va., leaving their children to the care of strangers who had become friends of the little people on account of public sympathy for the parents. The future author, then three years old, was adopted by a prosperous merchant, John Allan; and Poe later took the name of his benefactor, and from that time on he was called Edgar Allan Poe. While this adoption by the Allans seemed at first a most providential thing, the later relation of the poet to this family was most unfortunate, and greatly changed his own outlook on life. The Allans at that time had no children, and Poe was brought up with the idea that their wealth at some time would be his. This hope was never realized; and when Poe was thrown on his own resources he found that the ideas he had acquired, and the disappointment that followed, were a distinct detriment to him. Thrown with people of broader sympathies, who could better understand the peculiarly sensitive nature of Poe, his whole career might have been far more successful.

He was placed in an English school for a while, and he has left us a charming though overdrawn picture of the place in his story William Wilson. Later he attended the academy in Richmond, Va., where some of his most lasting friendships were formed, and then went to the University of Virginia for a few terms. Gay and careless, he was led into expenses which he even then regretted and which probably helped to make his first break with Mr. Allan. His scholarship, however, was of the highest. What others attained with great difficulty he mastered with ease. Study was not work but play to him. Casting about for something to do, as he could expect no help from Mr. Allan, he published an edition of his juvenile poems. This was not a great success. The poems show but little of the polish and charm of his later work, and Poe wished that they had never been committed to the printer's hands. In July, 1830, he became a cadet at West Point; and here, as at other points in his career, his intense individualism militated against his success. At first he stood at the head of his class, and all went well; but he soon tired of the strict discipline and deliberately worked himself out of the institution. Again he entered the literary field, and he wrote poetry for the Baltimore papers. He won a prize of $100 for a short story offered by one of them. This led to his getting a position on the new Southern Literary Messenger. From this he transferred his activities to The New York Quarterly Review. Dr. Hawks, of that paper, had asked him: "I wish you to fall in with your broad-axe amidst this miserable literary trash that surrounds us." His long story, Arthur Gordon Pym, was printed in this publication, and, though unappreciated here, was warmly received in England. In 1838 he became editor of The Gentleman's Magazine. Ligeia, inspired by a dream, and Poe's favorite story, was published, further enhancing his reputation, followed soon by The Fall of the House of Usher, one of his weirdest tales.

In 1847 Poe moved to Fordham, as it was thought the country air might benefit his wife's health. Poe and her mother remained there some time after her death, his writings taking on a still more sombre hue. The cottage still stands, a Mecca for literary pilgrims, and on the 19th a number of his admirers will gather there. Then he went to various cities for a while, again to Richmond, and his career closed in Baltimore in 1849.

There have been eminent foreign critics who maintain that Poe is the most original of American poets. His range was not great, but certainly what he composed is so unique, so unlike, in ideas, tone and execution, the prevailing style of either his poetic predecessors or contemporaries, that his poems stand apart and pre-eminent in the anthologies. Where else can be found finer cadences than in Annabel Lee, more ear-lingering music than in The Bells, or more sustained weirdness than in The Raven? If a writer to-day, in looking over the entire field of American poetry, should pronounce The Raven the most striking or the most original poem written this side of the Atlantic, we doubt whether literary public opinion would seriously care to dispute the claim. Unfortunately for Poe, his writings—prose and poetry—were not of a kind to bring him decent compensation in a period when the rewards of literature were meager and far below the demands of merit. As with many another genius in this world, a full appreciation of Poe's deserts was withheld from him until it was too late for him to hear the full-chorused plaudits.

The magazines and miscellaneous departments of the daily press nowadays swarm with stories in which sleuths of villainy figure, and there are hair-raising climaxes where scoundrels come to grief and justice wins. It is not easy to go back of the short tragic stories or sketches of Poe for the originals of this popular kind of literature. Not one of Conan Doyle's fascinating contributions to this shelf of the sensational surpasses The Murders in the Rue Morgue or The Mystery of Marie Roget. The analytical power displayed in a portion of Poe's writings will always command the admiration of readers keen to follow the unravelings of the mysterious.

The Poe Cottage at Fordham, New York

The circumstances of his early life were not favorable to the development of the spiritual side of his character. Yet here and there we have glimpses in his poems of a vision of higher things—of heaven and the angels. As it is, no impure thought or suggestion ever sullied his work, which, imperfectly understood and poorly appreciated in his lifetime, is now justly regarded with admiration as equal to if not exceeding that of any of his American contemporaries of the nineteenth century.

Among the Workers

idleness was misery. Come it must and will, in some form or other, and we discover that our scheme of life has only been a makeshift and turns to dust and ashes like other less worthy ends.

We are driven relentlessly back on God. As years go on, and the sadness of life comes home to us, we feel that we get comfort and strength nowhere else but in the reality of God and in a simple trust in Christ's "Hereafter." It is like a strong hand in the dark to believe that God our Father loved us and gave us eternal comfort and good hope through grace. That is the one infallible way of finding comfort for your hearts and stablishing them in every good work and word. The only way to make peace secure and to save our work from futility and our lives from vanity is the way of faith. Without faith in God and God's love, and God's future for us, I do not see how there can be for us any true comfort. Without it we are open at every turn to any shock of chance and every alarm of fate. But with such faith we can lift up our burden with serenity, and perform our tasks with peace, and find joy in our work, looking upon it simply and sweetly as service. And if, and when, the very worst comes—when all our activities are taken from us, we are not robbed of everything; nay, we are robbed of nothing; for our life is hid with Christ in God. True faith expands for every fresh need, and when the need comes the comfort comes also, and out of weakness men are made strong by faith in Christ Jesus. When we are oppressed by the burden and overwhelmed by the spectacle of human misery, we must learn that there is a deeper thing than happiness, and that is peace; and eternal peace is only to be had in communion with the eternal God.

Italy's Great Sorrow

AS WE read the tragic story of the great earthquake in Southern Italy, it is impossible to repress a feeling of horror at the fate of the two hundred thousand human beings suddenly awakened from sleep to meet a death from which there was no escape. In that mighty convulsion of nature which shook hills, tore up the ocean's bed, flung the seas inland and leveled cities in the dust in a few seconds of time, mere humanity was of no more account than a pinch of wind-blown dust or a colony of ants. Disasters like those of Messina and Reggio, where multitudes perished in a moment, and where the proud evidences of civilization were suddenly crumpled up and reduced to the condition of an ash heap, will make most of us reflect on the uncertainty of life, the vanity of human ambition and the overwhelming power of those hidden forces of nature which man,with all his vaunted skill, may never hope to control or escape. Yet the material losses, however vast, may be repaired; but nothing can call back the precious lives that have gone out in this appalling calamity.

So, while we may regret the havoc wrought among these lovely retreats, and the ruin of the noble buildings, the quaint old palaces and the artistic setting which harmonized so well with the matchless blue of Mediterranean skies and the delightful climate, these seem but trifles when we look upon the sorrow and suffering of the Italian people in their great affliction. The whole world turns to them in sympathy with their bereavement. It is a blessed and a gracious sight to see the unanimity with which other countries have begun to help the sufferers, our own land among the number.

Let us do our share in this sad benevolence. It is a privilege, as well as a duty, to extend the hand of helpfulness to those in suffering, and the readers of this journal, who have spanned the world with their noble charities and who have been the means of saving life in every campaign in which they have entered, should not permit to pass unheeded the appeal of those thousands of Calabrian and Sicilian survivors. Mourning for the dead will not help the living. Those that escaped death by the earthquake are now fighting a grim battle with disease and starvation. Let us show to these afflicted brothers and sisters how kind and generous and Christlike is the sympathy of Christian America. How petty and trivial seem our every-day trials and troubles beside their overwhelming sorrow. So many of them are now homeless and utterly helpless that the whole world's charity would hardly be adequate to supply their needs.

Confidently relying upon the co-operation of our readers in this great work of benevolence, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has advanced the sum of $20,000 to begin relief operations in Messina, Catania and other cities. The work is already in operation, and calls for immediate support until the crisis is past. What is to be done, therefore, to save human lives and to avert suffering, must be done quickly. Send in your gift, with a prayer and a blessing, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and thus help to lessen the heavy burden of suffering which has so suddenly fallen upon an unfortunate people.

Senators on Woman Suffrage

THE interesting article by Mr. Stowe on woman suffrage, which appears in another part of this issue, will surprise nearly all who read it. The report had been circulated that the United States Senate was practically a unit against this measure. Mr. Stowe says that of ten Senators with whom he talked on the subject, nine were in favor of it. As eight of the nine were from States in which women have the full suffrage right, their attitude is significant and decisive.

It has long been maintained by thoughtful women, especially those who are deeply interested in education and philanthropy, that the participation of their sex in politics would greatly hasten measures now pending for the promotion of the noble ends so dear to them. This view is confirmed by the testimony of the nine Senators. They all agree that the influence of women on the politics of the various States which they represent has been elevating; that education has especially been benefited; that the election of Judge Lindsey, a measure which the best people regarded as essential, could not have been secured without the help of the women; and, perhaps most significant remark of all, none of the ill effects predicted by the opponents of woman suffrage have developed in the four suffrage States, in one of which women have voted for thirty-nine years.

All this is in line with what Jane Addams, Florence Kelly and Mrs. Frederick Nathan, among the philanthropists, and a host of distinguished women among the active workers for the cause have always contended. Never was a more noble and devoted body of women; and those who are now championing the movement—Miss Shaw, Mrs. Catt, Mrs. Loines, Mrs. Harper, Mrs. Crossett, and their coworkers—are worthy successors to the original band.

It is gratifying that the Senators from the "woman-suffrage States" so heartily endorse the cause of the women of America. In the present world-wide and acute interest in the subject, when all honest inquirers are looking for reliable testimony concerning it, and are anxious to array themselves on the right side, such witnesses are authoritative.

A National Labor Exchange

WHEN the National Labor Council, called at the suggestion of Secretary Straus, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, meets in Washington toward the close of the present month, the principal subject which it will consider will be the proposition to establish a great National Labor Exchange. Industrial conditions throughout the country, and the great and constantly increasing number of unemployed in our larger cities, have made this one of the most urgent questions of the day.

When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD opened its Free Labor Bureau, in connection with the work of the Bowery Mission, some two years ago, the experiment—which was the pioneer of its kind—demonstrated conclusively that a Bureau, free alike to employer and employee, was greatly needed. In these two years, thousands of unemployed men and lads have been sent to employers in New York and neighboring States, and not a few to the West and South. This practical illustration showed that a broader experiment, conducted along similar lines, under government auspices, would result in immense advantage, as it would relieve congestion by bringing idle labor to its natural market.

Such, we understand, is precisely the principle Secretary Straus has in view in proposing a National Labor Exchange. Such an institution, under government auspices, with branches in all the large cities and industrial centres, not overlooking the great agricultural districts of the West and Southwest, would go very far toward accomplishing what is needed. It should and doubtless would receive the hearty support of large employers of labor, and presumably of the labor organizations also. It could make known the state of supply and demand in the labor market at all leading points, and arrange to meet the demand promptly by sending men at specially low transportation rates. Irresponsible intelligence offices and labor bureaus would no longer be possible, and the workers would, in dealing with a National Labor Exchange, escape extortion and other abuses and be assured of proper treatment and protection.

This Labor Exchange proposition is a distinct step forward, and we hope to see it fairly and fully discussed by the approaching Council. If properly organized and conducted on business principles, it should meet the approval of workingmen and employers generally.

SICILY'S APPEAL FOR AID

SICILY—where Garibaldi celebrated his greatest triumphs, that ultimately resulted in the present United Kingdom of Italy—Sicily, the land of bright sunshine, lovely flowers and luscious fruit, the land of perennial summer, has been stricken and laid low. Several of her chief cities, and many of her populous and prosperous towns and villages, have been wiped from off the face of the earth. Two hundred thousand of her people have perished, and two millions have been utterly impoverished. The stories of their sufferings are almost too heart-rending to admit of publication. The daily papers furnish the shocking details. Our duty is not to rehearse here revolting scenes, but to plead, and plead earnestly, for the survivors, and to help them all we can. They are in fearful straits. They do not speak English, hence they cannot plead understandingly with us for themselves. But I can and will plead for them, and I know that I shall not plead in vain.

Never yet has the generous American heart turned a deaf ear to the pitiful cry of the destitute, the desolate, the hungry or the distressed, and surely in this instance, as in all others, the response will be in accord with our glorious record in the past.

The Good Book says, "He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord, and that which he hath given will he pay him again." Then let us each and everyone make an investment now, at the commencement of the new year, and lend unto the Lord all we can possibly spare, and surely before the year has come to an end he will repay with usury all that we have lent him.

Let every town, every village, be represented in this glorious life-saving work. Let every church, every Sunday School, every class meeting, every Home and Foreign Missionary Society do its share, and do it liberally to rescue this unfortunate people. This is an exceptional opportunity to do good in the Master's name. We are his almoners. He gave up all for us, and now through these starving people he claims a share of what he has entrusted to our care. Are we unjust stewards? God forbid!

Every contribution, however small, will be fully acknowledged now in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and later by Him who shall say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father; for I was a hungered, and ye gave me bread, I was naked and ye clothed me. Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me."

We plead with you to act quickly. This is the King's business, and requires haste. What will you do to-day?

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Ship-Load of Bibles

A LITTLE craft loaded with a cargo of Bibles, hymnals and tracts, the first ever published in the tongue of the natives of the Gilbert Islands, left Honolulu December 9 for the South Seas. This was the missionary schooner Hiram Bingham, named after the pioneer American missionary who labored among the Gilbert Kanakas, Hiram Bingham the second. Just before sailing, a most solemn and impressive prayer service was held on the vessel's deck, participated in by many prominent citizens of Honolulu, the sons and daughters, grandchildren and great-grandchildren of the Boston missionaries who had evangelized the Hawaiian Islands almost a hundred years ago. The crew of the schooner consists of six persons: Captain Walkup and his son as skipper and mate, his daughter Eleanor as cook, and three Hawaiian sailors. Honolulu has been the headquarters for American South Sea evangelistic work for half a century, and many of the sons and daughters of those who went there from Boston, have, in their turn, gone to evangelize the South Sea Islanders. Hiram Bingham the second, one of the truest and best of men, after a long life of devotion to the islands of the South Sea, came to the United States recently to correct the proofs of his Gilbertese Bible, and died suddenly before that task had been completed; and now this ship, bearing his name, is carrying the Bibles he translated to the people for whom he wrought and whom he loved so well. And these Bibles, and the living teachers and preachers that shall interpret them, will continue his work through the generations in bringing souls into the kingdom of God.

What a new inspiration to the foreign missionary work and to the toilers in the home field the shipload of Bibles, in the native tongue, will be! And thus the sowing of the seed goes on, and the earth is growing white with the harvest.

So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed. (Acts 19:20.)

The Sugar King Dead

The death of Claus Spreckels removed from the Pacific coast its most conspicuous merchant, and from America one of its noted multi-millionaires. Claus Spreckels, a boy of eighteen, landed in New York from Lumstedt, Hanover, Germany. He was a poor immigrant lad, with only three dollars in his pocket. Ignorant of the English language, with almost no education, he sought and found work. By thrift and economy and indomitable industry, he accumulated enough to start a grocery store in Church Street, New York. He went to Louisville, Ky., and then to Charleston, S. C., where he engaged in business; and, when the gold fever broke out in California, he went to San Francisco, where he established a grocery store. In 1863 he invested his capital in a sugar refinery. Mr. Spreckels sought the Hawaiian Islands as the fruitful source of sugar supply for the Pacific coast. He instituted the most intimate relationships with King Kalakaua, which yielded him enormous amounts of money; later, however, he fell out with the king, and their bitter animosities were mutual. The buildings and appliances were multiplied; he bought up or broke up his rivals; laid his hand on sugar supplies and on lines of transportation, and became the acknowledged Sugar King. He invaded the territory of the Sugar Trust by building a mammoth refinery in Philadelphia. After running it for a little while he sold it out to the Sugar Trust, which gave him several millions of dollars of profit.

While we cannot commend his wrecking of rivals in business, nor his alliances with nations, too friendly to himself and at the expense of the public, we can commend the many qualities which made him so successful a man, from whom so much went out to enrich and build up the Pacific coast and our national resources. His intellectual ability, his tireless industry, his lofty ambition, his tremendous "push," his economy and prudence and genuine enterprise, made him a great merchant and a powerful man. Most of our millionaire merchants have been the children of poverty and of hard work. In the front rank of these self-made men stood Claus Spreckels.

He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand: but the hand of the diligent maketh rich. (Prov. 10:4.)

Kaiser and Total Abstinence

It is reported, on what seems to be the best of authority, that the German Emperor has announced his purpose of totally abstaining from all alcoholic beverages, including beer, hereafter. He says he never intends to drink another drop of liquor as long as he lives. He has given orders that, at dinners where liquor is served to others, a non-alcoholic drink from champagne bottles shall be served to himself. He says he does not intend to interfere with the habits of others, but that he knows that this temperate step is wise for him.

It is highly probable that the Emperor has become convinced of the truth of the teaching of science that alcohol is a poison, and that the system is better off without it. He may also feel that the damage and danger of the liquor traffic are so great that his example is necessary in the interest of thrift and good morals. It may be that the race-wide revolt against the excessive use of intoxicating drinks, and the crimes of the liquor business in all nations, has stirred his conscience to courage upon the side of the right. King Abgarus of Edessa was converted to Christianity by a missionary, and his people followed him into the Christian faith almost in a day. It is to be hoped the good example set by the Emperor of Germany will lead many of his countrymen, and those of other nations, to a similar course.

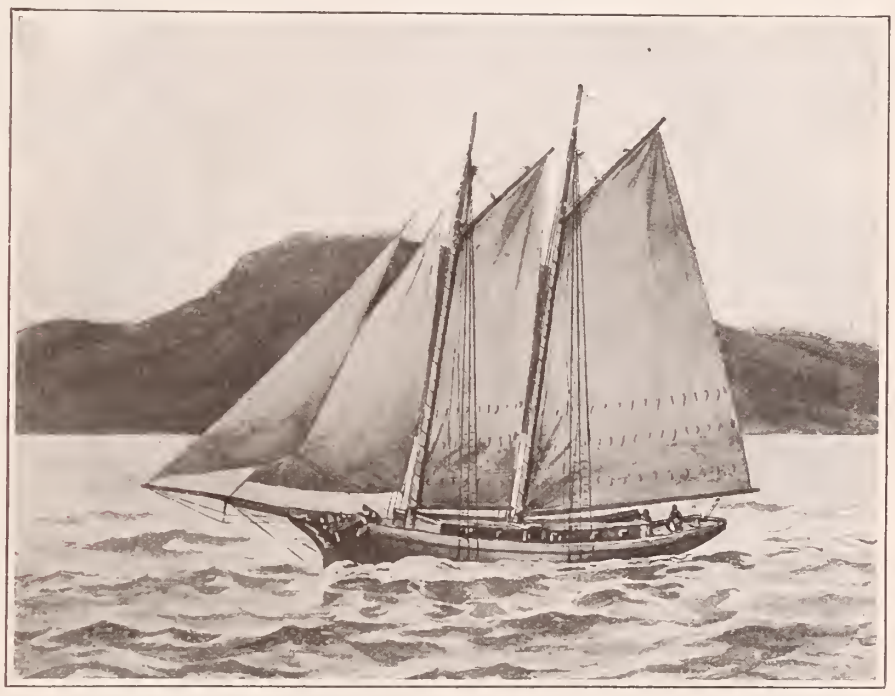
Cathedral in the Mire

Eight hundred years ago, Winchester Cathedral, in England, was built. A very bad site was chosen for its location—the borders of a bog. The builders laid beech logs in transverse layers over the bed of soft earth which they found when they dug down some ten feet for their foundations. Gradually the cathedral has been subsiding. It was discovered three years ago that a portion of it had sunk over two feet, forcing the walls outward, so that they threatened to fall. To-day the west front is all shored up, and the outer walls, east of the transepts, have been protected. The gables of both transepts lean outward and are cracked, and the great columns of the nave are out of line and lean outward. The sum of $100,000 is required to save the building, and subscriptions for that amount are being raised.

There has been somewhat similar trouble in the erection of the new police headquarters on Centre Street, in New York City. After the foundation had been laid, and the structure reared, it was discovered that quicksand was under the foundation. The north front of the building had to be torn down and caissons sunk, to furnish a safe basis on which the structure could rest.

In the building of character what a necessary thing it is to have the right kind of a foundation; not on the shifting sands of temporality or expediency, but upon the solid rock of truth.

Whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock. And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand. (Matt. 7:24, 26.)



The Missionary Schooner Which Carried a Cargo of Bibles, Tracts and Hymnals

Raising Wild Animals

For several years Mr. M. F. Kendrick has maintained a pheasant exhibit in the city park in Denver, Colo., expending for that purpose thousands of dollars of his own money. His love for and knowledge of birds led him to set apart a preserve not only for the raising of pheasants, but of other wild birds and wild animals of many kinds. At the suggestion of Dr. William T. Hornaday, of the New York Zoological Society, and other noted naturalists, Mr. Kendrick has established a preserve which will be conducted by an association known as the Kendrick Pheasantries and Wild Game Association. For the first years, only animals that inhabit North America will be raised; but, in time, lions, tigers and even elephants will be supplied for the market. At present the farm will be stocked with deer, elk, antelope, buffalo, mountain goats, bears, etc. The association has bought 1,600 acres of land nine miles south of Denver, including a lake fifty acres in area, the Platte River furnishing the water. The animals for human food will be sold to the market and the wild beasts to the States and cities for their zoological departments and to the shows for their specimens. Mr. Kendrick insists that the experiment willl be commercially more profitable than if his farm were used for raising cattle.

God gave man dominion over the earth, and over the lower tribes that inhabit it. The animals that are fit for food he raises for slaughter, and even the wild beasts that would destroy he tames and employs as teachers for instruction.

Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands: all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field. (Ps. 8:6, 7.)

A Great Gift

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I received the morocco-bound Bible as a premium to your valuable paper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is truly a great gift and words cannot express my appreciation of it. I will, with great pleasure, tell my friends and neighbors about it. I do not see how you can afford to make such a liberal offer. As to your paper, I always look forward with great pleasure for the coming number, and am very anxious to know what is coming next. F. E. NICKELL.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

Home Life as Seen by the Novelist

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IN THESE days the novelists have taken to preaching, and the fiction they give us partakes of the nature of a sermon. The latest comer in this field is Mr. Robert Herrick, whose clever story of American life, bearing the alluring title Together, has recently been published by the Macmillian Company. Mr. Herrick's books are always thoughtful, his point of view is invariably worth considering, and his attitude toward abuses, small and great, is that of the austere moralist. He never condones iniquity. He often espouses the side of the poor. He approaches his art in the spirit of a prophet of old, whom no one can deter from uttering the truth as he sees it. To the American public Mr. Herrick makes a direct appeal, and his vivid presentation of home life, as he conceives it to be, is interesting to the thoughtful observer. His book begins with a wedding. Isabelle Price, the beautiful daughter of a millionaire merchant in St. Louis, is married in the first chapter to John Lane, a young railroad man with a future. We congratulate the couple after the ceremony, we accompany them on their wedding journey, we have a glimpse of them in their honeymoon in the Adirondacks, and we then go with them to their new home in Torso, Ind. Isabelle is supposed to be a fair representative of the modern American girl, trained in the finest schools, accustomed to the best society, and lavishly provided by a doting father with an extremely liberal allowance. She has not, unfortunately, the power to convince us that she is a real girl, such a girl as her Creator means her to be. The daughter of Colonel Price ought to have had better stuff in her, ought to have known the real thing from pinchbeck, ought indeed to have had higher standards. Her young husband, setting out bravely enough, a strong, clean-cut, sturdy American, with brains and pluck, distinctly deteriorates under her influence. She is not altogether happy in Torso, whose people seem to her unfashionable and second-class, and for her most intimate acquaintance she chooses a little woman superficially childlike, but wilful, extravagant and hard beneath the surface. Mr. Herrick seems incapable of describing a wholly satisfactory woman, although his men are as good in their way as those of his brother novelist, Marion Crawford. The latter, too, seldom succeeds in portraying an ideally fine woman. Can it be that the fiction writers of to-day have lost the subtle sympathy with womankind that enabled Sir Walter Scott, W. M. Thackeray and Anthony Trollope to paint for us women who seemed composed of veritable flesh and blood?

Mr. Herrick makes a strong point of the American woman's reluctance to become a mother. He is not quite true to the spirit of the woman of to-day. Twenty-five years ago the American wife often pitied herself, and was commiserated by her friends, if she were about to undergo the experience of maternity. To-day we have made a great advance, and babies are welcome to most mothers during pre-natal days, as they always are when the thrill of possession comes to the encircling arms. Isabelle Lane is so acutely distressed at the prospect of bearing a child that she sinks into a state of distressing invalidism, becomes pale and anæmic, is almost too feeble to bring her infant into the world, and after its birth baffles a dozen specialists to discover the origin of, and to find a cure for, her physical debility. She has a devoted husband, a luxurious home, large wealth, youth, friends, every blessing the world can give, and a little daughter whom she cannot nurse, and who seems to impart to her no drop of joy. The situation lacks plausibility. One woman in Mr. Herrick's book, Alice Johnston, is large, loving and human, a wife and mother of the dear old-fashioned, noble type, with which life has made us familiar. She has married her Steve "for better or for worse," and she is his true helpmate. Other women in the book, in one way or another, drag their husbands down. Bessie Falkner, who married her Robert for love, ruins him by her wilful extravagance. She at least is consistently depicted, for the woman who is extravagant on a small income, and who persistently runs into debt and gives entertainments that she cannot afford on that basis, will as a matter of course continue to do the same thing when her husband's salary is largely augmented, and in addition she falls heir to an unexpected legacy. Extravagance is a relative term, and when practised as the Falkners did it, owing to Bessie's folly, it carries a family to inevitable wreck with the celerity of a toboggan slide.

Together is a book to provoke discussion, and it contains some plain lessons that married people everywhere might take to heart. It is written with sincerity, and is decidedly a novel with a purpose. Men and women alike may find in its pages something to ponder over and to act upon, although they will find it too serious for mere diversion.

HER LETTER

LITTLE lines of communication from heart to heart and home to home extend around the globe through the postal facilities of this period. A dear one in a distant land does not forget the people he left behind, and when a letter comes to the favorite sister the whole family are interested, as the neighbors will be, to hear the good news from the absent boy.

Simple Ways of Entertaining

SIMPLICITY in entertaining is often accompanied by great elegance. The housekeeper who does her own work, and who has no one to wait at table, need not forego the pleasure of having friends at her board. A dinner of three courses is as satisfactory to the palate as one of twelve, and it may easily be prepared by any one who understands the art of domestic management. A clear soup, a roast chicken with two vegetables and a mince pie make a dinner sufficiently inviting for the most fastidious guest, if the viands are delicious of their kind.

Not long ago a youthful matron invited several friends to luncheon, preparing the substantials of the meal in a chafing dish on the table. Everything in the simple menu was perfectly prepared, and although several courses were served, there was no hitch and the cost of the meal was not much greater than it would have been if served to her own family. Afternoon tea is easily served and is within the reach of anyone who wishes to gather her friends about her. One may offer a cup of tea with thin bread and butter or small cakes to a single friend, a group of friends, or a room full of people. For large evening companies tea and coffee with sandwiches is a sufficient bill of fare.

Many people deny themselves the privilege of offering hospitality because they cannot afford a caterer, lavish decoration and a sumptuously spread table. Yet, on reflection, every one must know that friends do not care so much about what they have to eat and drink as about the cordial hand extended, the gladness of welcome and the opportunity of talking freely and without constraint in congenial company.

Lend a Hand

It is to Edward Everett Hale that we Americans owe four beautiful rules for daily living. They are so simple and sweet, so brave and strong, that they might well be framed and kept in sight in each of our households. Here they are:

Look out, and not in;
Look up, and not down;
Look forward, and not back;
Lend a hand.

A very little thought convinces us that nine-tenths of our daily trouble would be spared us if, instead of looking in at our own souls, we looked out on the needs of our brothers and our opportunities for service. Looking up to God, we are daily strengthened for duty, and looking forward we see that there is something better farther on.

Bright skies are just before us
Where darkest clouds have been.

To lend a hand we do not need to be officious or intrusive. Always around us there are those who are less in want of material aid than of sympathy and understanding. We lend a hand to the child when we take time to listen to her little story of work or play. We lend a hand when we sit down beside the convalescent and give her a word of cheer. We lend a hand when we use our influence to find the right position for a lad who has left school and is starting on a business career. The selfish and cold-hearted, absorbed in taking care of Number One, never lend a hand to anyone. How can they when they ignore the three rules that precede the suggestion for real human fellowship? Read and ponder them all.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—PROTESTANT COUNCILS AND CONVENTIONS. From time to time great undenominational conferences are held. Previous notices are always given in the press. Such councils are held in Europe and America and occasionally in the Far East.

Leader of Turkey's Parliament

FORTUNATELY for the future of constitutional government in Turkey a man who represents the best among the Ottomans has been chosen president of the new Parliament. He is Kutchewk Said Pasha. His career reads more like a romance of the Middle Ages than the life of a statesman of the twentieth century. He had pronounced modern views and had little use for the ring which had got themselves into the good graces of the Sultan and were running the Turkish government about as they pleased. Whenever a crisis occurred they endeavored to place the blame on him and have him act as a scapegoat, usually without success. He was quick to checkmate plots against him.

Kutchewk Said Pasha

His ability was so great that, despite the powerful influence of his enemies, he was raised six times to the high office of Minister of Foreign Affairs. When the political storm was beginning to break which resulted in the declaration of the Constitution. suspicion fell upon him and he fled to the British Embassy for protection.

He is of Kurdish blood, and his name, Kutchewk, was given him on account of his small stature. Probably he has reached the height of his ambition to be elected to the presidency of the first Parliament. The eyes of the world are on him and the newly elected deputies to see if they use their new found power wisely and well, for the benefit of all the Ottomans.

The first session of the new legislative body was held in the chamber where the short-lived Parliament of thirty-one years ago held its sessions. It is on the first floor, and of moderate dimensions. On each side of the chamber are reserved places for state councillors and senators. A tribune is reserved overhead for the Sultan; there is a box for foreign diplomats and places for newspaper correspondents. The general public may sit over the boxes on either side.

The opening of Parliament was carried out much as in European assemblies. The Sultan was greeted with great enthusiasm, and read a speech from the throne. The speech defined Turkey's position in relation to foreign countries, and was well received.

Just before the opening session was held the organ of the Young Turk Committee published the following appeal to all Ottomans: "Sovereigns and foreign nations have their eyes fixed on Turkey. If, therefore, we Ottomans are animated with the same spirit as the Ottomans in the Chamber, we open a new era of prosperity and liberty; but if, on the other hand, we abandon ourselves to race quarrels, we commit treason against the country. Let us, therefore, place ourselves above such paltry wrangling, and march, with one accord, toward the ideal of progress and civilization."

Studies in Social Service

DR. JOSIAH STRONG, President of the American Institute of Social Service, has opened a new department, which is meeting with remarkable appreciation. The Little Doctor

A New Serial Story Written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

George Hunter and Dudley Verner were college chums and are stopping at the country home of the former, before George is about to start practice as a lawyer and Dudley as a physician. George is introduced to Miss Danforth, daughter of Squire Danforth, who lives on the fine estate called "Paradise." Dudley is most anxious to meet her. A village character, Jack Green, takes them to see "Paradise." He says that they do not often receive company, but spend much time in travel. They there meet Miss Danforth at the well, and Dudley is introduced. A thunder storm comes up and the young men are invited to take shelter in the house, where they stay to dinner. As they leave, the Squire drives by on the way home. His daughter is surprised at his sudden return. She explains why the young men had been there. He says he is particular about his visitors, and asks her not to do more than recognize them hereafter. He says that he is going abroad, and will take her and her aunt. They go to call on Mrs. Hunter and her niece, Miss Sanborn. The Squire discovers that Mrs. Hunter is an old friend. On his return he tells Aunt Phœbe a family secret, which greatly agitates her, but which she cannot tell Miss Danforth. Marian stays up until early in the morning, when the aunt falls asleep. That day Mr. Hunter and Mr. Verner call to wish them a pleasant voyage. Dudley Verner starts life as a doctor in a quiet neighborhood. The two friends save a little boy named Donald Fraser from being run over, and Dudley takes him home and brings George the next day to see him. Mrs. Fraser faints as George says, "Ellen, is it you?"

CHAPTER VII

THE second letter received from Marian by Mrs. Hunter and her niece was written at a little village not far from the town of Melrose and near the famous ruins of the old abbey. She said:

"My Dear Friend:

"Your letter postmarked at dear old Branksome was gladly received. We are delighted to hear from all the friends, but especially that dear Mrs. Hunter's health is so much improved.

"We had one delightful excursion from Glasgow, an old friend of my father's, whom we met in that city, accompanying us. We left early and sailed down the Clyde, enjoying the scenery in the bright morning light.

"We crossed Loch Goil, the water of which is very black and inky looking, and involuntarily my thoughts went back to my old school book and the words of the poem connected with this loch:

"Oh, who be ye would cross Loch Goil,
This dark and stormy water?
Oh, I'm the Chief of Ulva's Isle,
And this, Lord Ullin's daughter.

"We came back by way of Loch Fyne, from which loch or lake the far-famed 'Loch Fyne herrings' are taken.

"The day that will, I think, have most interest for you, was the one spent at Melrose and Abbottsford.

"A few miles back of this village, on the hills, there is a quaint old place, formerly inhabited solely by gipsies.

"Mr. Morrison, my father's friend, hired a conveyance and we started over the hills one morning, on our way to visit Esther, queen of the gipsies. After a ride we entered 'Yetholm,' the gipsy village, and after a little search, found the house occupied by Queen Esther. It was a perfect bower of roses and honeysuckle, reminding one of a pretty summer house on a well-kept lawn. The inside of the house corresponded in order and beauty with the outside. We were fortunate enough to find the owner at home. She was a tall, dignified old lady of eighty years, who received us in a courteous and hospitable manner, showing us letters from the nobility far and near. They addressed her as 'Her Majesty, Queen Esther.' She claimed to be an Egyptian, and to have as good a claim to the title of 'queen' as any monarch in the world.

"Knowing we were from America, she would not hear of our leaving until we had taken tea with her, giving us cake baked by her own hands.

"One would never think of associating Esther, Queen of the Gipsies, with the fortune-telling gipsies that travel through our country at home.

"Being so near the border line between England and Scotland, we went one day to visit Berwick. From Berwick we enter Scotland, and half a mile further on we reach the village of Lamberton, celebrated as a second Gretna Green. Just near that place the stream of water separating the two countries is so narrow that it is said one can stand with a foot on either side of the stream, one in England, the other in Scotland.

"It seemed strange the night we came home from our trip to Berwick, when walking on the bank of the river Tweed, to be able to read very clearly, at nine o'clock, a letter received on our return.

"My father took me one day—just he and I alone—to visit my mother's grave. In that quiet churchyard, under a lovely larch tree, a single grave, where the beautiful flowers of her native land are kept blooming the summer long by a loving friend's tender hand, contains all that is mortal of my darling mother. On the beautiful headstone are these words:

"Erected by James Danforth
"In loving memory of "Nellie.

"I wanted to ask all about the dear mother, of whose loving care I have no recollection, but my father seemed so grieved about her that I could not intrude upon his sorrow by asking questions.

"He took me to visit the old woman who had been my nurse. Her emotion at the sight of me was great. My father sent me out for a walk while he and Nurse Walker had a long talk, no doubt about the young wife and mother who had been called away so early, and whose last thoughts and words, on earth, had been of her little daughter.

"As I strolled along, I saw an old woman, wrinkled and bent with age, sitting by the side of a door-step. She looked so lonely and miserable that I stopped and spoke to her.

"'Dear me,' she said, 'you gae me sic a start. I thought you was bonnie Miss Nellie, but, eh me, many a year has come and gone since then. Where be you frae?' she asked.

"I told her, and oh, I did so want to ask if by 'Miss Nellie' she meant my mother, but father had requested me not to speak to any one of her, unless he were present, so I crushed down the feeling of longing to know all about my mother, and asked if she were lonely. I found that she lived alone, and when she said, 'Do you sing? I knew one like you that was a bonnie singer,' I sang these words:

When my final farewell to the world I have said,
And gladly lie down to my rest,
When softly the watchers shall say, She is dead,
And fold my pale hands o'er my breast;
And when with my glorified vision at last,
The walls of that city I see,
Will anyone then at the beautiful gate
Be waiting and watching for me?

"She neither spoke nor moved, but sat with a faraway look in her eyes, so I went on and sang the song so popular at home, and beginning:

I am far frae my hame, and I'm weary often whiles,
For the longed-for hame-bringing and my Father's welcome smiles.
I'll ne'er be fu' content, until my een do see,
The gowden gates of Heaven in my ain countrie.

"Alternately smiling and weeping, she thanked me, calling down blessings

ROSY AND PLUMP
Good Health from Right Food.

"It's not a new food to me," remarked a Va. man, in speaking of Grape-Nuts.

"About twelve months ago my wife was in very bad health, could not keep anything on her stomach. The Doctor recommended milk half water but it was not sufficiently nourishing.

"A friend of mine told me one day to try Grape-Nuts and cream. The result was really marvelous. My wife soon regained her usual strength and to-day is as rosy and plump as when a girl of sixteen.

"These are plain facts and nothing I could say in praise of Grape-Nuts would exaggerate in the least, the value of the great food."

upon my head, and saying as I turned away, 'Eh, but she is like bonnie Miss Nellie.'

"I joined my father and, walking through green lanes and daisy-spangled meadows, we returned home, where Aunt Phœbe was impatiently awaiting our coming, as there were letters from Branksome the news in which she was anxious to learn.

"MARIAN DANFORTH."

CHAPTER VIII

THE frightened look on Mrs. Fraser's face, and the startled words of George—"Ellen, is it you?"—spoke volumes to Dudley Verner; and before Donald could look up from the flowers at which he was gazing delightedly, with remarkable presence of mind Dudley stepped in front of Mrs. Fraser and George, and called Donald's attention to something in the street.

George had caught her as she fainted, so that the sound of falling had not reached the little fellow's ears. The sight of the pale, upturned face would have caused him a great fright. Dudley felt that he must not see it and whispered to him, "Your mamma is not very well, but you know doctors can do a great deal. I am going to give her some medicine. Do not take your eyes off my horses down there. Tell me if they start."

All this was hurriedly whispered to the child ere George had time to think what ought to be done.

Quietly and quickly Dudley administered a restorative; and at last the pale lips moved, the eyelids unclosed, and she tried to sit up, calling faintly, "Donald!" Her first thought was of her child.

"I am here, mamma," he answered; "I'm watching the doctor's horses."

She smiled feebly, but again, as she looked at George, the deadly pallor overspread her face.

Dudley again applied to her lips a reviving draught.

She drank it unresistingly and lay down.

"Now I want you to let me have your son for a little while," he said. "He and I will take a drive. I will carry him down to the carriage."

She hesitated, but George whispered, "Let him go, Ellen; he will be quite safe, and the air will do him good."

"I shall leave you here, George, and call for you in about an hour. Will you come with me, Donald?"

"Oh, yes," he cried; "I'll not be long, mamma."

Very tenderly the little boy was lifted in Dudley's arms, and as he said, "Good bye, mamma," she smiled to him through her tears.

Dudley rightly divined, although he knew nothing of the relations existing between his friend and Mrs. Fraser, that they would like to be alone to talk over the circumstances which had brought about this surprising interview.

The hour was lengthened out to two, for Dudley had taken the child, after a delightful drive, to his office, where they could rest and talk.

He found the boy to be intelligent beyond his years, but to an inquiry in regard to his lameness, Donald replied in a rather embarrassed manner, "Mamma can tell you all about it better than I can, doctor."

Was there something of sadness connected with the cause, that even such a child must evade a reply?

When the doctor and little Donald returned, they found Mrs. Fraser quite recovered. At George's suggestion, a tempting luncheon was spread from the supplies which they had brought, and Dudley was invited to remain, although she evidently shrank from the thought of entertaining guests in her poor home.

From among the scanty remnants of her few happy married years, she had kept some dainty table linen and pieces of silver and china.

George judged rightly, that the best way to make them all feel at home with each other, and to speedily ripen this strange friendship, from the influence of which he hoped much, was an impromptu meal. During its progress he broached to Dudley some of the plans which he had been suggesting to Mrs. Fraser. Among them was her immediate return to her old life with his mother. He appealed to his friend to confirm what he said about the beauty of Branksome, and of his own home.

Promising to call next day, the young men took their departure.

As they drove along, George confided to Dudley that Mrs. Fraser was his father's youngest sister, who, after the death of their parents, had made her home with her brother.

An acquaintance with a Captain Fraser, formed during a visit to a friend, had speedily ripened into mutual love; but her brother frowned upon the young soldier's suit, and forbade him to visit or to write to his sister.

THE FAITH THAT HEALS*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"PETER and John," once rivals for political honors the Messiah was expected to give, were now close friends, going together to the temple.

"The ninth hour." Three o'clock in the afternoon. There were services in the temple daily at nine, three and six o'clock. The Jews say these hours had been consecrated by Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, in the order in which they are given.

"A certain man that was lame," lame from birth, lame in his ankle bones and feet (Acts 3:7). "Laid daily at the door of the temple," brought there by family, friends or neighbors, that he might be at an advantageous place for begging. For many years he had been brought there, for he was then forty years old.

At the Beautiful Gate

It was the gate leading into Soloman's Porch, on the east side of the temple. It was built of Corinthian brass, and was so heavy that twenty men were required to open it or to close it. A market for the sale of sacrificial animals was held near by, and the gate was in line of a great thoroughfare, hence a good place for a beggar to be.

"Asked to receive an alms," probably by an outstretched hand. Evidently he did not look into the faces of Peter and John, for Peter said, "Look on us." Then he cast an expectant look upon them.

"Peter said, Silver and gold have I none." Peter and John were quite accustomed to be without money. When the apostles were with Jesus, Judas carried the purse for all. When Jesus had sent them out, two and two, he had told them to "provide neither gold, silver nor brass." And now that all Christians had all things in common there was no need that they should have money on their persons.

"But what I have, that give I thee." Peter knew that he had the power of God for the healing of the man.

"In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, walk." Peter's helping hand went with his words, to give the man courage to do as he was told.

"And leaping up, he stood and began to walk." He walked without learning how to do it. It is not unusual for persons who have had no use of their limbs for a while to be in need of being taught how to walk. But that lame man not only walked, but leaped immediately.

"He entered into the temple," not with slow and dignified steps, but leaping and praising God.

"And all the people saw him." They could not help looking at him.

"They were filled with wonder and amazement." Naturally they would be, for most of them had seen him nearly all of their lives entirely unable to take a step.

"He held Peter and John," either for fear of the people, or for gratitude.

"All of the people ran together unto them," to see those who had done such a miracle, and to hear what they had to say about it. And Peter took the opportunity to preach the name of Jesus. What an audience he had that day! More eloquent than the words of Peter was the presence of the man who had been healed.

A Preacher of Righteousness

Just a few days since we saw Peno Penick, from Africa, stand in front of an audience of Christian people, with a clay idol in his hand. It was thrilling to hear him tell that six years ago he was living in a hut near the desert of Sahara, and that this was the god which he had worshiped. It was thrilling to hear him tell how he went alone into the open and prayed that God would send "light into his heathen soul," and lead him in the way to become a preacher of righteousness to his own people. And then he told us how God had given him strength and opportunity to earn his living and secure his education, until he stood before us, a graduate of Howard University, just waiting on the Lord to put it into the hearts of some persons to send him to Africa to begin his work. Some day, no doubt, we shall hear of a great work done in Africa by Peno Penick.

The lame man who was healed that day at the Beautiful Gate did not become a preacher of righteousness, but he certainly became a text for a sermon, and many, because of his cure, believed on the Lord Jesus Christ.

Medical Missionaries Open the Way

What would you do if you woke some morn,
And how would the morning seem,
If you found that your faith in the Son of God
Was only a midnight dream?
That the city above was only a myth,
The thought of a poet's brain;
That there was no Christ for the heart's deep want,
No cure for its hunger and pain?
If all of the light and all of the love,
All that is good and true,
Should go out of your life like a wind-blown lamp,
What would you do? A. E. JOHNSTON.

And thus is described what we sometimes call "heathen darkness." And there is no cure for human pain, only the most abominable charlatanry, cruel in the extreme. It is well known that the medical missionary has a peculiar advantage in opening the way for the Gospel. A United States official in the Philippines told us that in his visits among the hill tribes he saw terrible physical suffering, which he could not do otherwise than attempt to relieve, even though he was not a physician. He spoke of one instance in particular, of a man who had a splinter of bamboo in his foot. The official said he did not know enough about anatomy to cut it out safely, and so he told the suffering man if he would wait until his visit the next year he would bring a man with him who could take it out. In telling this story the official remarked, "I am confident that if medical missionaries could go among the hill tribes in the Philippines, they could Christianize those people." When on our way to China there were a number of medical missionaries on shipboard, returning to China, who had most interesting experiences to relate about the great number of people who had become Christians by first receiving medical aid. Even one person in a village cured had the effect of making all of the others willing to listen to the preaching of the Gospel. In a certain village in China was an old man named Kung, who had a blind son. A missionary came to that village to preach the Gospel, and, finding the blind boy, sent him to school in Peking; and he came back a fine Christian, able to read creditably the raised letter books which are prepared in that school, and also able to make such books himself. When the people saw how wonderfully improved the blind son had become, and that he could even write his own books and make his own library, it made an impression on the villagers, and they were less hostile to Christianity, for they knew that heathen religions are always cruel to the unfortunate. The blind young man is now a valued evangelist.

But notice the great paucity of medical missionaries in China. In China

THREE OF A KIND

Dropped Coffee, Picked Up Postum, and Health

The harmful action of caffeine—the drug in coffee and tea—is the same in all cases, it is only a matter of degree.

One person may suffer more in the way of heart palpitation, sour stomach, nervousness, or insomnia, than another, but the poison is there all the time, if one continues to drink coffee or tea.

A Penn., lady and two friends learned the truth about coffee in the same way. The lady writes:—

"About four years ago I had an attack of nervous prostration and a great deal of trouble with my heart. Sometimes feared I was dying, and my doctor seemed unable to find out the cause of my trouble.

"I would frequently wake at night with these attacks and the doctor said there was some constant irritation of the nerves, and he began to think some organic disease was at work.

"One day I was told of a case very similar to mine, and that the woman could find no relief until she stopped using coffee. I did not like the idea of giving up coffee, for I was very fond of it.

"Having read frequently of Postum, I determined to try it. It certainly made a great change in me. Those spells left me entirely.

"My most intimate friend was afflicted as I was. In fact, the similarity of our afflictions drew us together in the first place. When she saw the great change Postum had made in me she tried it and was benefited as I was.

"The beneficial effects of Postum on us two induced a neighbor to follow our example and so we are three of a kind who can't say enough in praise of Postum."

Sunday School Lesson

there is one medical missionary to one and two-thirds millions of people; in the United States the same number of people have 2,667 physicians. Who will not say there is an open door for usefulness in China? Some medical missionary schools are now in operation in China, and ere long there will begin to be a supply of native Christian physicians. Some of these schools are for the education of Chinese women physicians, and girl graduates are already at work among the women and children, doing skilful work, even surgery. There is in China one hospital for the insane for more than four hundred millions of people. It is conducted by American missionaries. We are told that 45 per cent. of those who are brought there are sent home well. Before Christianity placed this beneficent institution in China, insane people did indeed live the lives of dogs, being chained in courtyards or sheds adjacent to dwellings. The effect that this "Retreat for the Insane" has upon the Chinese people in general may be judged from the fact that, during the Boxer war, orders were given by the Boxers that it must be preserved. In passing it must be told that the physician in charge of that Retreat said to us that new developments in insanity were now being shown in patients brought to them, which are traceable to alcoholic drinks. Shame upon the white nations of the world, including the United States, England, Germany and France, that send such liquors to China, which has been a prohibition land for centuries!

But medical missions are planted in missionary lands other than China, and always with the result of being a most effective means for opening the way for the preaching of the Gospel.

And is this strange? since

Christ Was the First Medical Missionary

In that opening sermon of his ministry, which he preached in the synagogue at Nazareth, he read from the prophet Isaiah: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he anointed me to preach good tidings to the poor; he hath sent me to proclaim release to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind; to set at liberty them that are bruised, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord." And then he said: "To-day hath this Scripture been fulfilled in your ears." And during the three years and more of his ministry he went about healing all manner of diseases, and even bringing the dead back to life. Not only did he heal the body, but the soul as well, and in the art of healing he is the sovereign physician.

The Great Physician now is near,
The sympathizing Jesus.
He stoops my drooping heart to cheer,
Oh, hear the voice of Jesus.

A Man of Little Faith

The beggar at the gate had so little faith that as he was about to be given strength to walk Peter saw it was necessary to take him by the hand and raise him up. Then the man's faith began to develop, and he was not only able to walk, but to leap.

Mr. Moody once said: "I used to think that God was going to give me all the faith I wanted right away. I was going to do wonders. God was going to give me faith great enough to remove mountains—turn the world upside down. 'Faith cometh by knowledge.' The more you know about people, the more faith you will have in them, if they deserve it. You will have faith in a good man if you have known him two years; but you will know him a good deal better after ten years, and you will have more faith in him. Faith grows. And the way to get acquainted with God is by studying his Word."

Light that Cannot be Hidden*

THE open Bible is the secret of the highest progress. Compare, for an instant, the lands in which the Bible is free to everyone; in which the ministers encourage its personal study by all their people, with those in which the Bible is not read. By the enormous superiority of those "Bible lands" one may judge somewhat of the illuminative power of "the light of the world."

One of the great Roman Catholic prelates preached not long ago a sermon upon the wisdom of shutting away the Bible from the unlearned.

"Why should each ignorant believer be allowed to interpret for himself the difficult sayings of prophets and apostles?" argued this accomplished theologian. "The result would be a thousand distorted images of the real truth, such as we see in the Protestant denominations. Thus arise their numerous sects, dividing their army and dissipating its strength. In our church, the Holy See interprets all difficult passages. Its decisions are enforced by its priests and teachers. There is no room for disagreement. Thus, one and indivisible, the great Roman Church marches on to victory."

This plausible theory might captivate the imagination, if only its practical workings were not shown to be mischievous; and if the countries in which the Bible is freely read by the common people were not by far the most cultured, most philanthropic and most noble in the world.

It is true that there are hard and mysterious sayings in our Bible; but they are not the essential ones. The way of salvation from sin—the great light which everyone needs in order to walk in the strait path—is made plain and simple in the Scriptures, and it cannot be hidden.

"Educate, educate!" has been the cry of Protestantism ever since the Reformation. "Teach every man to think for himself. The more he thinks, and the wiser he becomes, the more reasonable and beautiful will the Scriptural view of life, death, duty, salvation, appear to him. The half-educated, the half-cultured, may stumble, but not the man who can 'see clear and think straight.' Found colleges. Plant schools everywhere. Set up hospitals. Build institutions for the orphan, the poor, the halt, the maimed—and give to them all the Bible. It will do them good, and not evil, all the days of their lives."

The free critic, Edmond Scherer, says: "The Bible will ever be the light of the mind and the bread of the soul. If there is anything certain in the world, it is that the destinies of the Bible are linked with the destinies of holiness on earth."

And this is because it is Christ who shineth through all the sacred record, shedding upon men, through its pages, the very light that cometh down from the Father in heaven.

All through the histories of the great pagan nations—Greece, Rome, Persia, India, China—runs the hollowness which resulted from the absence in them of the great finalities of the Christian system. All of their brilliancy, all of their beauty, is marred by these defects. The completeness of Christ's great plan; its adaptation to the needs of the human soul; its incentive to altruism; its hope of immortality; these constitute light for our race, the "topmost, ineffablest crown," with which a good God has crowned his creatures.

Lessons from Genesis*

MANY good Christians have wondered why God permitted the frank chronicles of the sin and shame of the great Jewish heroes to stand in the sacred record. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David, Solomon—all of them are stained with guilt, and the stories of their lapses from virtue are openly given us—"naught extenuating."

Perhaps there is no stronger proof than this of the authenticity of the ancient Jewish Scriptures. No merely man-made Bible would so fully set down the crimes and weaknesses of the founders of a great and noble faith. To this day, biographers are notoriously partial and disingenuous regarding their subjects. When Froude dared to obey the sacred charge of Carlyle, and show him to the world in all his gruffness and injustice and meanness, as well as in his greatness, how that world was shocked! It is said of Mohammed by Johnstone, one of his chief biographers, that "everything that could tend to his glory was eagerly sought out and treasured up by men jealous of his good name; and everything that might seem to detract therefrom was carefully suppressed."

Not so with the candid writers of the Old Testament; but the great ethical lessons which are there revealed to us, are lessons which all Christians need, while the consciousness that those great men were humanly weak like ourselves, should be a source of encouragement. The faith taught by Abraham, for instance, outweighs all else in his story. No obedience in history was more wonderful than his. "It was folly to the world," says Mr. Moody. "It was in violation of the strongest humanities. It meant exile from his fatherland . . . and he had already lived seventy-five years. But through that act of obedience God blessed him." Let us learn his noble loyalty.

Jacob was called a prince with God, and he reaped in his old age, in his deceitful sins, the just reward of his unfilial deception in his youth. Let this teach us honor.

Moses, whom the Lord knew "face to face," was punished in his latter days for his unbelief. Let this help us to banish our doubts.

David, "the Lord's anointed," under Nathan's prophecy, acknowledges his awful sin against Uriah. Let this teach us the duty of repentance.

Everywhere is apparent the truth of Paul's keen words: "All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." God saw in the beginning that "every imagining of the thoughts of man's heart was only evil continually." The same thought is voiced by the Psalmist, "There is none that doeth good, no, not one." Perhaps Joseph, Joshua and Samuel are the most nearly perfect among the great characters of the Old Testament, and they may have had failings which were not set down.

There is something grandly impressive in the fact that this wonderful book of Genesis is probably the most widely known piece of literature in the world. Its events and characters have overflowed the realm of religious history and become a part of the great universal literature, instructing millions who never named the name of Christ.

Perhaps of all the great patriarchs, Moses stands out as the most wonderful. He had

The monarch mind, the mystery of commanding,
The birth-hour gift, the art Napoleon,
Of welding, moulding, gathering, banding
The hearts of thousands till they moved as one.

Everybody asks this question after a fire. The next question, which is just as important, "What Company?" nobody asks. The property owners of America pay annually three hundred million dollars in premiums for fire insurance, but not one in ten of them knows even the name of the Company whose policy may be his only asset in case of disaster. The Lame Man Healed

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

GOD has revealed himself as the Lord our Healer (Ex. 15:26); and this title applies to him as much now as in Old Testament times. He teaches us also that healing is his statute and ordinance. "There he made for them a statute and an ordinance, and there he proved them, and said, If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt do that which is right in his sight, and wilt give ear to his commandments, and keep all his statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee which I have brought upon the Egyptians; for I am the Lord that healeth thee" (or "the Lord thy Healer").

The attitude of mind which causes men to say that healing was only for the time of our Lord and his immediate successors has no warrant in the Word of God. In every age, when spiritual life has risen to its true level, holiness of life and healing have been found together as an invariable result.

Peter and John were in the freshness of the unction which had come upon them on the day of Pentecost. They "went up together into the temple at the hour of prayer, being the ninth hour." Although themselves temples of the Holy Ghost, they did not count themselves exempt from the duty of public worship. A daily occurrence took place; a certain beggar, "lame from his mother's womb, was carried, whom they laid daily at the gate of the temple which is called Beautiful, to ask alms of them that entered into the temple." The poor man had no other means of subsistence than the degrading one of begging; he must either die or beg, so he made capital of his infirmity, and traded upon his impotence to walk, by exciting the compassion of the passers-by. Among others, he begged of Peter and John, but he met with an unlooked-for answer: "Peter, fastening his eyes upon him, with John said: "Look on us. And he gave heed unto them, expecting to receive something of them." But his expectations were far below the glorious reality.

"Then said Peter, Silver and gold have I none; but such as I have give I thee: In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk."

Was not this rather a dangerous experiment? do you say? Reader, would you attempt it with any lame one in your neighborhood? With Peter it was no experiment; he had received the commission to heal the sick as well as to preach the Gospel, and he had heard the risen Jesus declare that those who believed should in his name "lay hands on the sick, and that they (should) recover." In that name of Jesus, in his authority, he had commanded the man to rise, and he knew that he could confidently rely upon his Lord for what was further needed. What happened? The moment the man acted faith, by allowing Peter to lift him up, the Lord met him; "Immediately his feet and ankle bones received strength. And he, leaping up, stood, and walked, and entered with them into the temple, walking, leaping, and praising God."

Many who are sick in soul, or body, or both, want to utilize the faith of others for their salvation, cleansing or healing, without themselves exercising faith. Oh that they would see that every real blessing comes from personal contact with God! The man who had been healed could not restrain himself; the first movement of his released feet had been to leap upward; he had not waited first to try how far they would bear his weight. No wonder he praised God!

The healing caused great excitement in Jerusalem. Every eye was strained to see the well-known beggar, "walking and leaping, and praising God"; curiosity and wonder were mingled with feelings of awe.

The History of the World has been warmly commended by our leading college professors, preachers and teachers, and by thousands of those who are foremost in all that makes for human progress and enlightenment. THE REASON for Dr. Ridpath's enviable position as an historian is his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian in any generation has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that thin line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt. He combines absorbing interest with supreme reliability and makes the heroes of history real living men and women, and about them he weaves the rise and fall of empires in such a fascinating style that history becomes as absorbingly interesting as the greatest of novels. Hundreds who read this have decided to buy Ridpath some day; now is the time. No need for us to tell you about Ridpath. The English-speaking world has pronounced this the only history of the world worth having. It is to-day in 200,000 American homes and is endorsed by Public Men, Educators, Business Men, the Clergy and everybody who knows history.

Latest News of Italian Relief Measures

UP TO THE MOMENT OF GOING TO PRESS

ONE OF THE MANY SHELTERS PROVIDED FOR THE SURVIVORS OF THE EARTHQUAKE

Save the Women and Children

BARON MAYOR DES PLANCHES, the Italian Ambassador, as the representative of his King and country, expressed to a representative of The Christian Herald who visited him in Washington, his gratitude for the kindness extended to Italy. When the Ambassador was told that The Christian Herald and its readers would be especially glad to help the poor bereaved Italian women and helpless orphan children, he was much agitated.

"It is the very phase of the subject which is now engaging the attention of our good Queen," he said. "The women and children are suffering in far greater numbers and far more severely than any other class. The accounts that reach us are heart-breaking. I am very sure that if Dr. Klopsch and his generous readers of The Christian Herald should wish to place a sum at her disposal for that purpose, the Queen of Italy would gladly appoint helpers, and herself see that it went where it would do the most far-reaching good. Our good Queen's heart is in this work. She is such a kind, lovable mother, and she is distressed beyond measure by this great sorrow that has come upon Italy; but her deepest concern now is for the helpless women and the thousands of orphan children.

The Distress Steadily Grows

"You do not know how the distress is growing," added the Ambassador earnestly. "At first the reports came only from the districts that lie along the seashore or which are traversed by railroads; but now the reports are coming in from the mountainous regions. These high mountain ranges are filled with villages and every day new reports come in from them and the disaster grows worse and worse. It means that for months and months and months they must have help or innumerable thousands must die, while other countless thousands linger in misery and torture. Under the circumstances, the philanthropy of The Christian Herald and its readers seems like an angel of light to me. There will be many in Italy who will pray for blessings upon its generous contributors."

The Red Cross Hard at Work

Mrs. Abby G. Baker, a representative of this journal in Washington, who has been in frequent communication with the State Department and the National Red Cross in connection with the Italian relief work, writes that all the Red Cross officials, from President-elect Taft down to the humblest clerk, are using their utmost efforts to make the movement a success in saving lives and assuaging suffering in the earthquake-stricken districts. Miss Mabel Boardman, to whom the successful reorganization of the Red Cross is largely due, has been one of the most active spirits in this great international benevolence. She is the daughter of one of the wealthiest men in Washington, and is devoting her time, her energies and her entire fortune to the Red Cross work. Other officials of the Society are co-operating effectively. In the State Department, Hon. Robert Bacon, Assistant Secretary, has rendered valuable and important aid. All expressed their gratification that The Christian Herald had taken up the cause of the Italian sufferers, and that Dr. Klopsch, in behalf of its readers, had cabled $50,000, of which $20,000 was sent through the State Department within two days after the earthquake, and $30,000 more later to help in loading the relief steamship Bayern with a cargo of food purchased exclusively with American contributions.

The Christian Herald's Aid Welcomed

"There is no other organization that can point to such a record of giving," said Secretary Bacon. "Look at what your readers have done for India, China, Japan, and every quarter of the globe where famine, pestilence or kindred disasters have prevailed. Please convey to Dr. Klopsch and the generous donors of The Christian Herald the sincere thanks of President Roosevelt, Mr. Secretary Root and myself. The Department of State is proud to be the medium through which The Christian Herald transmits its benefactions."

In a recent meeting in Madison Square Garden, New York, held in aid of the Italian Relief Work, Vice President Fairbanks said that the National Government had done much already toward relieving the misery in Calabria and Sicily, but the Government could not be expected to do everything. Every man who could afford it ought to give something toward the cause. There had never been in our history so great a demand upon our generosity.

All contributions to the Relief Work should be addressed: CHRISTIAN HERALD ITALIAN RELIEF FUND, 92 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK. Every contribution will be acknowledged in these pages. Special contributions for the MOTHERS' AND BABIES' FUND, under the personal direction of the Queen of Italy, for supplying milk, medicines and other necessaries for the women and children, should be so designated.

Musicians to Play for the Dalai

WHEN THE DALAI LAMA CAME

By HENRI OLIVIER, Peking, China

THE sudden transition from ancient to modern was somewhat striking a few days ago, when I proceeded direct from an inspection of the Yellow Temple to a game of golf, on one of the finest golf courses in the world. Peking is unlike other capitals, in that, once outside the wall, you are in a desert, thus being a marked contrast to American and European cities, which straggle on to an undiscernible end.

The Yellow Temple is situated about a mile beyond the northern gate, and across the Peking plain. It contains some of the finest carved stone work in China. On the occasion of my recent visit it was especially interesting on account of the preparations that were being made for housing the Dalai Lama. The coming of this exalted wanderer was long heralded, and at last, with his numerous suite, he is safely installed in the quarters assigned to him during his stay, which is liable to be indefinitely prolonged.

The Dalai Lama, or head of the Buddhist Church, has been an exile from his official residence ever since Colonel Younghusband made his successful expedition to Tibet nearly five years ago. His departure was probably due to the fact that his immediate followers would not have permitted him to live a day after the English entered Lhassa, the holy centre of Buddhism.

To the Buddhists the Dalai Lama is the living reincarnation of Buddha, and they place him at the head of their entire hierarchy. He is supposed to be the reincarnation of Bodhisattva Avalokiteswara, as the Banshen Lama is believed to be the reincarnation of Bodhisattva Manchusri, the two being the most exalted and revered of the divinities "proceeding from the essence of the Buddha himself."

The second in succession of the Dalai Lamas solidly established the hierarchy that now exists, instituting a number of smaller spiritual dignitaries who were also to be continued by a series of reembodiments. They are known all over China as the "Living Buddhas." Theoretically, the Dalai Lama and the Banshen Lama are equal. In practice, however, the former is superior, as besides the same amount of spiritual power, he also has a greater temporal power, and rules over a larger country and more people than the Banshen Lama. To the latter is assigned the maintenance of the purity of religious doctrine, while to the Dalai Lama is confided the more practical attributes of the belief.

Up to comparatively recent times the succession to the office of Dalai Lama was open to considerable fraud, the family and surroundings of each successive pontiff being desirous of deciding who should be the new Avatar. In 1792, however, the Emperor Ch'ien Lung ordained that the succession should be decided by the drawing of lots. When, therefore, a Dalai Lama dies or "enters upon the perfection of repose" (to use the words of the text), inquiries are made by the priests regarding miraculous signs which may have been observed upon the birth of children at about that time. These are always readily obtained, and transmitted to the imperial residents at Lhassa. The documents are carefully gone over, and a report sent to Peking, after which a certain number of the children are brought, with their parents, to Lhassa. On a fixed date their names are written on small wooden slabs, carefully sealed and deposited in the "golden urn." The name drawn from the urn is hailed with universal rejoicing as that of the new incarnation, and the Dalai Lama is declared to have "come forth in reembodiment." The infant is given a short period of instruction, and is solemnly enthroned at the age of three years.

It can readily be seen that such a system puts the power in the hands of his immediate followers, as during the child's minority he is completely under their control, and upon reaching the age when a man is liable to think and want to act for himself he is done away with in Tibetan fashion, it usually being found that his food did not quite agree with him.

The present Dalai Lama, at thirty-two years of age, has far exceeded in length of office any of his predecessors. This accounts for his unwillingness to return to Tibet. He feels fairly safe away from there, and knows what difficulties would confront the imperial government should he die away from home.

He has with him a following of several thousand Tibetans and Lamas, and they are a difficult lot to control. A Lama priest is assured of paradise after death, and claims to have, so to speak, a place reserved in heaven. There is consequently no element of fear to restrain him; and hardly a day passed when the newspapers did not report robberies or acts of violence perpetrated by the Lamas along their route of travel.

Specially Photographed for the "Christian Herald"

The Dalai Lama's Arrival at Peking Station

However, if waiting throngs, regiments of soldiers, bands and all the regulation formalities of a triumphal entry count for anything in China, the Dalai Lama may consider himself an important personage, and his official reception all that could be desired. Certainly there was no lack of ceremony and enthusiasm in the welcome that awaited him. And Peking now entertains a distinguished visitor without its gates.

It will be interesting to observe the unfolding of a struggle between Church and State in Asia.

The Widow's Mites

TEXT—Luke 21 : 1-4

THIS is almost invariably misquoted. "The widow's mite," we say. But, in point of fact, the woman had two mites, and she gave both of them—"two mites, which make a farthing." The farthing is the smallest of English coins, but the ancients subdivided money still more minutely—a striking evidence of the poverty of the times. Two mites (about half a cent) were all that this woman had. St. Luke uses very strong words to describe the contrast between her property-rating and that of the other contributors to the temple treasury. The language of our Authorized Version scarcely does justice to the original text. If you would get the full force of the Greek, read, for "abundance," "superfluity"; and, for "penury," "less-than-nothing-ness." She did have something, this poor widow; but it was so very, very little, that to speak of it, rhetorically, as a minus quantity was justifiable exaggeration.

No picture in all the New Testament is more familiar to the eye of our minds than this one of the poor widow casting in her tiny gift; nor are there any Bible words that more readily repeat themselves in our memories than those in which the incident is described by St. Mark and St. Luke; and yet there is room to fear that the true significance of the woman's act, and the real lesson taught by our Lord's comment upon it, are very generally missed.

Christ's Purpose in the Contrast

There are two or three obvious inferences, which even superficial readers and careless hearers of the story draw from it at once; and these we will, first of all, get out of our way, so that the ground may be cleared for more serious work. It is plain, for instance, that the woman was a very generous woman, to have given away all that she had. We will take that for granted. Whether she was a prudent woman, whether she kept in mind the third of the four cardinal virtues, whether she ought not to have held back at least one of her two mites against an emergency, are questions we will not touch, lest we become entangled in one of the hottest of the controversies that vex the life of modern relief societies.

Another of the obvious suggestions of the story is that it is impossible for rich people to be generous up to the standard of this woman's generosity without immediately ceasing to be rich. If they give away all that they have, they will be rich no longer; they will not be even comfortably well off.

How, then, is a rich man to exercise self-denial, or even to know with any accuracy of knowledge what self-denial means, unless, indeed, he throws the wish and intention to be a rich man overboard altogether and becomes voluntarily even such as this poor widow was? But if all people, without exception, were to embrace voluntary poverty, who would be the gainer? And, moreover, what reason is there to think that universal poverty would inure to universal blessedness?

These are the aspects of the story that present themselves to the eye at once. If we look no deeper, the impression we get is, that our Lord, in the words he uses, is lashing the rich for the encouragement and gratification of the poor.

But pray, what does it mean, some one asks, if it does not mean that? Could anything be more evident and palpable than the fact that Christ intended to put the things into sharp, clear-cut contrast? And are not the two things which he so purposed contrasting these, namely, the habitual niggardliness of the rich and the acknowledged liberality of the poor?

"A Living" Means "a Life"

No, I answer; that is not quite the right way of putting it, or the fair. Christ is indeed, as you say, setting two things in sharp contrast, and bidding us observe how different the one is from the other; but the two things thus compared are not riches and poverty, but half-heartedness and whole-heartedness—moral qualities, personal characteristics, which may accompany either poverty or riches, as we shall see. They can be credited indiscriminately to no class.

What I mean is, that, so far from Christ's setting up, in this instance, two standards, one for the rich and one for the poor; or even three standards, one for the poor, one for the fairly well off, and one for the wealthy, he is, in point of fact, commending a single standard, and that single standard the one established by the woman with the farthing contribution, she who cast in all the living that she had. That is Christ's test of genuine devotion—nothing less than that—willingness to give all.

But all of what? Ah, there we touch, as with a needle's point, the very centre of the whole matter. The woman cast in all the living that she had. Yes, but what is a living? And are we, indeed, shut up to one method of casting a living into the treasury of God? Is an alms basin the only conceivable receptacle for what the human soul has to offer to its Maker or to its fellows? Can charity, in the true sense of the word, be dropped into a brass-bound box of oak, or kept stored up in an iron safe? Again I ask, What is a "living"? Perhaps the commonest reply would be, A living is that by which soul and body are kept together. When we earn, or make, or get a living, as it is variously expressed, we are doing what in us lies to render longer continuance on the earth's surface possible. In a word, a living is a means of subsistence. Over in England they call a cure of souls, a pastoral charge, the thing which ought to be esteemed so sacred, "a living," and even go so far as to talk of "family livings," and "college livings," meaning by these phrases the opportunities for statedly and continuously preaching the Gospel and ministering the sacraments, which a man, under some circumstances, may expect to secure from his family or his college. We of the Episcopal Church have been importing, of late years, a good many Anglican phrases and usages—more, perhaps, than were altogether desirable. Let us devoutly trust that this particular term may never find its way across the sea. A "living" ought to mean, which literally it does mean, a life; and with no less worthy interpretation of the word should we rest content.

The Acceptable Offering

Your "living," in the truest and best sense, is the aggregate of all things that go to make up your life. Your natural gifts, be they more or fewer; the powers that you were born with; the native abilities which men count in as part of your starting capital; in a word, your "talents," wherever on the scale, which runs from one to ten, they may happen to find their limit. These constitute a part of your living. Add to these your acquired skills and dexterities, of whatever sort they may be—the talents gaining other talents; all that you learned at school; all that you have since learned from books, travel and social intercourse—these all count as going to make up the sum total of your "living."

But there is more still—there is that subtle, impalpable, hard to be defined, but very real thing, known as your influence. As nations colonized on strange shores are said to have their several spheres of influence, so has every man and woman a certain dimly defined area in which his or her influence tells. The source of this man's influence may be his material possessions, the source of that man's his knowledge or his professional skill, the source of still another's a pleasing address and captivating manners; be it this, or be it that which is the main spring of your influence, the influence itself counts as one of your assets; it is a part of your living, seeing that it contributes to the entirety of your life, for we have agreed that "living" and "life" shall be, so far as our present purpose is concerned, exchangeable terms. If you can think of anything in the way of a possession or an acquisition that I have left out in the accounting, I pray you add it mentally to the list, so as to make sure, before we go a step further, that your whole living has been reckoned in. Now, then, the doctrine I am laying down, the doctrine which I believe the story of the woman and her two mites was intended to enunciate and enforce, is this: that if we would be acceptable givers, if we would have our offering favorably received, we must cast the whole of this living of ours, yes, literally the whole of it, into the treasury of God!

True, the only thing told us about this poor widow is that she cast in two mites. Having regard to the fact that she was so terribly poor, that she had no friends, and no appreciable influence, Christ described her contribution as "all the living that she had." But perhaps he saw something more than the money. Possibly he discerned in the expression of her countenance evidence that, along with her two mites, there went whatever she possessed of spiritual resource, love, compassion, sympathy, tenderness of heart—everything she had.

Consecrate the Entire Life

You see how the doctrine, as I am putting it, cuts completely under all petty and paltry considerations as to the fractional portion of one's income that ought to be devoted to what are called charitable and pious uses. It has nothing to do with tithings and apportionments. It is not this or that percentage of your possessions that you owe to God—you owe him everything. To make your life, with all that it contains and includes, accomplish the very utmost that it is capable of accomplishing for the betterment of this world in which you find yourself temporarily resident, that is your duty, that and nothing less. You complain that this teaching is too severe, that the ideal held up is practically unattainable. Give us an easier standard, you cry. But heroes are not made by lowering standards, neither are strong souls won over to religion by being told how very easy it is to be religious. Jesus Christ demands of man nothing less than the consecration of the entire life, with all its powers, faculties, abilities, to the service of Almighty God. How else can we interpret those stern sentences in which he lays down the conditions of discipleship? How otherwise has the Church understood him? Could she possibly have found more emphatic words in which, as his representative, to speak, than those scored deep into the very substance of her liturgy, "And here we offer and present unto thee, O Lord, ourselves." It is not "our money," "our contributions," "our alms"—that has already been done at an earlier and less fervid stage of the service—but now it is, "Here we offer and present unto thee, O Lord, ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable, holy and living sacrifice unto thee." The man or woman who, in deep and dead earnest, takes these words upon his lips or hers does for the real treasury of God (that vast receptacle in which is stored the splendid wealth of a whole universe) precisely what the poor widow did whom Jesus praised. That is, in deed and truth, to cast in all the living that one has.

The duty of making the whole life tell for God, that is the point I press—the whole life, not any one constituent portion of the life, but all of it. It is an impertinence on the preacher's part when he descends to particulars, and undertakes to say to individuals in just what manner and by just what rules this general principle ought to be carried out. No preacher can do that without coming, and justly coming, under suspicion of seeking the furtherance of his own schemes for the upbuilding of the kingdom.

The Fallacy of "Hedonism"

No; all that the preacher ought to attempt is to present his ideal, so that it may be distinctly visible; and then to try to inflame the hearts of them who listen to him, and who believe in his truthfulness, with an earnest longing to have that ideal realized in their own experience. Beyond that he, the preacher, cannot go; but far, very far, beyond that the voice of another speaker, the voice of the Holy Spirit of God, can go; for of the Spirit it is written, that he "helpeth our infirmities"; yes, and he makes us know that certain things which are impossible with men are possible with God.

One of the things possible with God is the reconstruction of men's notions as to the objects best worth living for. How many people in this great city, to go no further afield, are making pleasurable sensations of one sort or another the main end in life? All surfaces must be velvet to the tread, all sounds musical upon the ear, all forms fastidiously correct, lest the eye rebel, and all the horror of the sorrow of this suffering world screened off.

ORGANIZING THE WOMEN WORKERS

IT IS one of the encouraging and cheerful signs of the times that many powerful groups of women have been called into activity in behalf of the millions of women workers in the United States. When it is remembered that, for so many years, women have worked as individuals in their own homes; that they enter industry unorganized; that they have no standard of hours, wages or working conditions; that they take what is given and work as they are told; that the wrong physical conditions frequently imposed react upon them with most terrible significance, their need for protection and enlightenment is fully realized.

Mrs. Rose Pastor Stokes
New York City

Mrs. Raymond Robins
Prest. Nat'l Women's League

Not only this, but it should be recalled that the first social effect of women in industry has been to lower the standard of wages and living for all laborers in related trades; a condition which, it is appropriately pointed out, not only places the women themselves under severe conditions of long hours and short pay, but adds to the difficulties of those who are seeking to maintain fair hours, fair wages and American standards for home life in every trade. The wives and children of the men thus competing with women suffer the heaviest costs of this competition.

The General Federation of Women's Clubs, some years ago, instituted an effective Standing Committee on the industrial problem as it affects women and children. The very existence of the Federation and the clubs which form it, is due to the fact that the primitive industries have gone out of the homes of the prosperous, leaving to the women in those homes leisure for study, recreation and philanthropy. But these industries have entered into the homes of the poor, ruining the domestic life and (especially in the needle trades) incidentally threatening community life and health, through the menace to those who purchase the products. Manufacture and commerce, too, have largely drawn from our homes the women and children to work in factories, workshops, stores, offices and public-service employment.

The Federated Women's Clubs have intelligently and sympathetically entered into the campaign, under the direction, first, of Mrs. Florence Kelley, and now of Mrs. Clarence Burns, of New York City, experts on the subject.

While education, legislation, organization and the ballot are regarded as the primal remedies for improving the standard of wages and hours for women, the greatest of these, it is held by those who know, is organization. While education in the trades will transform women from unskilled into skilled workers, it is undeniable that some of the most miserable wages to-day are paid the skilled workers in the sewing trades. The ballot in the hands of workingwomen would be one of the most decisive methods by which they could command a hearing. But organization into unions, it is held, is the strongest available factor at present to bring about fair wages, shorter hours, and decent working conditions.

This work of organization has been led by public spirited and philanthropic women, among whom are Miss Mary McDowell, of Chicago, head resident, Chicago University Settlement; Mrs. Ellen Henrotin, former president, General Federation Women's Clubs; Miss Margaret Haley, president National Teachers' Federation; Mrs. Mary M. Kehew, president Women's Educational and Industrial Union, Boston; Miss Jane Addams, Hull House; Mrs. Harriet M. Van Der Vaart, Mrs. Raymond Robbins, Miss Mary E. Dreier, New York City, and many others. They formed the National Women's Trade Union League, which now numbers local organizations in four of the biggest manufacturing cities of the country—New York, Chicago, Boston and St. Louis. The oldest—the Illinois League—is composed of over fifty organizations. About thirty-five of these are women's trade unions, ranging from horse-nail makers and Italian garment workers up through waitresses, label workers and teachers. The Industrial Committee of Illinois Federation of Women's Clubs; the various settlement and local women's clubs; the Consumers' League, the Political Equality Union and the Socialist Women's League are among the affiliated societies.

The strength of the Women's Trade Union League lies in its capacity to train wage-earning women for the work of organization, so that they may bear their fair share with the men in the effort to raise the standard of living for wage-earners. The Consumers' League ranks as another tremendous force for the betterment of industrial conditions. Another factor which materially helps women workers is the Research Department of the Women's Municipal League (with local associations in New York, Philadelphia and Boston), which has made a recent investigation of the living and economic conditions of five thousand immigrant women, indicating the necessity of establishing a more definite system of protection by the nation and States.

All these varied forces of women at work for women workers have been greatly cheered by the result of the interesting test case in Oregon of national importance, brought before the United States Supreme Court, as to whether or not it be constitutional to restrict the hours of women's work. The Supreme Court of the United States, happily, upheld the Oregon statute, limiting the hours of work for women in industrial pursuits (which the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois, in 1895, had held to be unconstitutional). And Justice Brewer, in handing down the decision, stated in vigorous terms the obvious need of such legislation. The way thus cleared, legislation has progressed, as each State is now free to frame a reasonable law protecting its workingwomen from harmful exploitation without fear of its being wrecked upon the rocks of unconstitutionality.

HOW SHE FOUND HER LOST BOY

THE President of the Sunday Breakfast Association, Philadelphia, Mr. Lewis U. Bean, relates the following incident:

One Sunday morning, on my arrival at the old church, a gentleman stepped up and said, "There is a lady on the platform upstairs, wearing a sealskin coat, who wishes to see you." I went up to her. She said, "Oh, sir, can't you help me find my poor lost boy?" and tears ran down her face. She said he had run away from home three years ago, when about thirteen, and as far as she knew he was a tramp. I said to her, "Are you a praying, Christian woman?" "Yes, and a member of the Presbyterian Church." "How came you here to seek your boy?" "I thought he might be in the congregation." After getting the boy's name, I stepped to the front, and called for him, but no reply came. After two or three inquiries, I went to the lower room, into the overflow meeting, and made the same inquiry, but without response. After standing on the platform a little while, in deep meditation and prayer, I stepped down through one of the narrow aisles, where I never go, excepting to see some one or on special business, and about one-third of the way down the aisle I stopped, with my hand under my chin, and thought: "It cannot be possible that God will send a poor, broken-hearted, Christian mother on a fool's errand after her boy. Lord, show us where to find the boy." Then at my right elbow I saw a young fellow, dirty all over, looking almost like a colored person, and as if he had not had a bath for months, or as if he might have just arrived in the city under a freight car, after many miles' travel. He said, "What did you say the boy's name was?" I said, "You know his name better than I do; you are the boy." He burst into tears, and said, "Yes, I am the boy. What are you going to do with me?" evidencing at once that he had been doing something criminal and expected arrest. He went with me behind a large partition in the back of the room, while I went and beckoned to the mother. I stayed between her and the boy, so that she could not see him until I stepped aside. When the mother discovered the boy, they both made a wild rush for each other and were gathered in each other's arms. Such a scene of love and affection I never before witnessed. The mother would press him to her bosom, kiss him and hug him, and then hold him at arm's length to be sure that she was not mistaken, while I stood with my head against the partition and big tears ran down my face and dropped to the bare floor. She cried out, "Oh, my boy! my boy! Why did you not come home?" He said, "Mother, I didn't know that you would allow me to come home."

We men folks know little or absolutely nothing about a mother's love for her children, and yet we are told in Scripture that a mother may forget her child, but Christ never forgets his children. After breakfast the mother took her boy home. Some time afterward one of the cleanest, brightest, nicest young men came to me and asked me if I remembered about that boy. "Yes," I said, "I do." "I am the boy," he said. "You cannot be the boy," said I. "What are you doing?" "I am in business in our little town, living with mother. I joined the church, and I am teaching a Sunday School class." I gave a shout: "Amen! praise the Lord!" Will anyone who doubts the efficacy of prayer please tell us how it came that this mother came to the Sunday Breakfast Association that Sunday morning, never having been there before in her life, and that this boy should have arrived from the far West about two o'clock that Sunday morning, having ridden underneath coal and freight cars all the way?

ALL ITALY PLUNGED IN SORROW

The Earthquake Horror Grows and Deaths From Wounds and Starvation Continue

A Little Maid of Sicily

Gathering Supplies in New York for the Sufferers

A Woman of Calabria

RIGHT generously are the American people responding to the call for help which was sent out as soon as the terrible plight of the earthquake sufferers in Southern Italy and Sicily became known. It was found that the first terrible report, as bad as it painted the picture of desolation and havoc, did not adequately show the extent of the disaster. Fresh accounts of observers now on the scene prove that it is probably one of the worst catastrophes in history.

Dr. Klopsch, knowing what could be expected from the generosity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, who have never turned a deaf ear to the appealing cries of suffering humanity in any part of the world, telegraphed in their behalf the additional sum of $30,000 to the State Department at Washington, to be added to the original $20,000 which was sent within twenty-four hours after the disaster occurred. This made a total of $50,000 advanced personally by Dr. Klopsch in anticipation of contributions. The money was sent free of charge from New York to Washington by President Vanderlip, of the National City Bank of New York City. Several hundred dollars were thus saved for the fund. Assistant Secretary of State Bacon, who has been in communication with Dr. Klopsch since the plan of sending American aid was started, at once cabled the money to Italy. Miss Mabel Boardman, of the Red Cross, has done valuable service in the present movement.

Relief Ship "Bayern" Sails

Ambassador Griscom, who was doing all possible to advance the relief work and fit out a ship with supplies at Naples, was greatly hampered by the lack of supplies; but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD check, together with money collected by the Red Cross, made the chartering of a vessel possible. CHRISTIAN HERALD readers may now feel that the relief work in which they are doing such a large part is well started. The steamer Bayern, lying at Genoa, was chartered from the Hamburg-American line, and a cargo of food was at once rushed on board. Doctors and volunteer nurses offered their services, and they were gladly accepted. The ship is to cruise along the Sicilian and Calabrian coasts for at least two weeks, and will stay longer if the money is forthcoming to continue the work. Ambassador Griscom stated that it was his intention to go with the steamer and remain several days in the vicinity of Messina. Mrs. Griscom is working unceasingly as chairman of a committee of American women in Rome to provide supplies of clothing in which the people, who are now huddled for the most part in military camps, are in great need.

The King expressed his heartfelt appreciation of the generosity of the American people, and the Prime Minister said: "What the United States is doing is magnificent, and shall not be forgotten. The United States stands first, outdistancing all others in sympathy and generosity. Our gratitude is so great that we cannot find words to express it. The people everywhere in the Italian towns, and the newspapers, are loud in their praise of the aid which is coming to them from America."

The Christian Herald on the Field

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has its own special correspondent in the devastated district, in the person of Rev. William Carter, of the Madison Avenue Reformed Church, New York City. Rev. Mr. Carter was in Switzerland when the earthquake occurred, but, on being commissioned to go to the earthquake zone as the representative of this paper, he started at once for Messina. He will send accurate and interesting accounts of the relief work now being done, and our readers can thus get a good idea of the way in which the money they are sending is being spent to relieve the most urgent cases.

Whether Messina and Reggio will ever be rebuilt is still an open question. Once it was seriously proposed that, after all hope of removing any one alive from the ruins had been abandoned, the warships should bombard the cities, so that the ragged walls now standing would fall in and bury the bodies where they were. This, however, seems to have been given up, and at last reports the authorities had decided to evacuate both cities, remove every living creature from the vicinity and draw a cordon of sentries about the cities until the government decided what should be done with them. A royal decree was issued placing the districts about Reggio and Messina in a state of siege. This is much more strict than ordinary martial law, which has been in force ever since the troops first arrived on the scene.

The rescue work, which began within a few hours after the third shock ended, is still going on at this writing. It is remarkable that any human beings could have retained a spark of life so long, some living after being entombed eight days. Probably the majority of the ruined buildings will never be investigated. There are tons of brick and stone above the bodies, and it would take machinery and a longer time than can be given to the work to dig them all out. Large quantities of sulphuric and carbolic acid and quicklime were shipped from Naples and used wherever the military authorities thought necessary to prevent pestilence starting from the decomposition of so many bodies.

A Street Scene in Messina Before the Earthquake

Heroic Work of Relief

One party of rescuers, when passing down one of Messina's streets, heard a voice cry plaintively, "Maria!" They stopped and listened. Again came the cry, but seemingly weaker. It evidently came from a basement choked with the wreckage of several floors. Instantly two dozen hands were at work pulling up timbers, dragging off great blocks of stone and brick. Finally, an opening was made, and greatly to the suprise of the searchers they found that a family parrot was below, calling for his mistress. Looking more carefully, they found at one side two unconscious people, who were dragged out and revived. Below these a third person was discovered. They could not get him out that night, but he was fed through a pipe and he was rescued next day.

One brave little girl of ten managed to keep herself and her two little brothers alive while they were entombed under the ruins of their home. All had been precipitated to the first floor when the shock came, and the parents were both killed. The wreckage had arched, as if by a miracle, above the girl's head, and though badly bruised she crawled about until she located her two little brothers, who were pinned by the wreckage though not mortally hurt. She thought if she could feed them they would live until help came. This little mother of the orphans found some coffee, boiled it and kept them cheered up until they were rescued. All of the children will recover.

Major J. F. Reynolds Sanders, the American military attaché in Rome, went to Messina, accompanied by Vice-Consul Cutting and Mr. Winthrop Chandler. They put a force of sixty soldiers to work on the ruins of the American consulate to find the bodies of Consul Arthur S. Cheney and his wife, who were killed in the earthquake. The work was exceedingly dangerous, as parts of the building still stood, but in such a tottering condition that it seemed as if a sudden gust of wind might blow in the fragmentary walls upon the searchers.

The Plight of the Children

As the rescuers gaze on the haggard and despairing people, working among the ruins during the days immediately following the cataclysm, it would seem that the lot of those whose lives were snuffed out in a moment is perhaps the most enviable. Parents dug among the ruins hoping against hope that their children might yet be alive somewhere beneath the tangled mass. Little ones wandered wildly back and forth, calling for the father or mother whose face they will never see again beneath the bright Sicilian sky. To utter strangers they stretched out their hands, crying, "Signore, signore, have you seen my mother, my father? Oh, signore, help us find them!" and then the despairing hearts gave way, and sitting down on some doorstep they would drop their heads upon their hands and weep with an anguish that could not be comforted. Then they would drag themselves up and begin again the weary round until they were compelled by the authorities to go out into the country or were sent up the west coast to Naples or other places in some relief steamer.

The utter helplessness felt by the American and foreign workers and others who arrived on the scene early they declare they will never forget. The need was so great, so urgent, the help so inadequate, and as for food supplies, they did not exist. But every one faced the situation with a remarkable courage, and did all that human skill could to search the ruins and care for the wounded. They knew that every moment's delay meant the loss of precious lives. Inside of a day or two starvation was added to the horrors of death and wounds. Men went wild with hunger, which seemed to gnaw at their very vitals, and fought savagely over a piece of bread taken from the ruins. Gaunt, hollow-eyed, emaciated children picked about among the rubbish in the villages in the outskirts, hunting almost with the vultures for something to sustain life. Even those who went to help were often in want of food. One English correspondent became almost famished and was overjoyed to find an old lemon rind, which he ate ravenously. The people about Reggio begged Deputy Lamagua to have the government take them away. Some were suffering so from hunger that they begged to be shot.

The towns and villages, cut off from outside sources of supplies, the boats for the most part having disappeared in the great tidal wave, and the railroads torn up and the tracks twisted, with everything in their own neighborhood ruined, are in a most pitiable plight. A British warship was cruising along the coast of Calabria when the sailors caught sight of men and women rushing along the beach. The numbers grew until thousands were gathered there, calling and holding out their hands as if seeking aid. They proved to be the starving population of Gioja Tauro, a town some miles from Reggio. The ship put in shore, and the gallant tars did what they could to meet the situation. They rigged up a hospital out of old sails on the beach, and the ship's doctors dressed wounds and cared for the sick among the refugees as well as they were able under the conditions. The sailors brought provisions ashore in rowboats and fed hundreds. It was pathetic to see these strong men trying, with their hearts bursting with pity, to alleviate the sufferings of these people, carrying on their conversation with the few Italian words they had picked up and filling in the pauses with sign language.

The sailors of all the fleets which have converged on the stricken coasts are doing manful work. The Russians in particular have distinguished themselves, several having lost their lives while trying to extricate people from the ruins, or having been shot while protecting them from looters.

Too much praise cannot be given the Italian soldiers, who have worked themselves to the point of utter exhaustion to save the people. They have got most of the refugees about Messina into military camps, and are caring for them the best they may.

At night the scene is most weird. Away up on the mountains gleam the thousands of campfires, around which are huddled little shivery groups, who crouch still closer to one another when the earth vibrates beneath their feet and the hills groan as if in pain. The shocks have not yet ceased, and there have been several a day since the great disaster, varying from two to six seconds. These repeated shocks fill the people with great apprehension, as their nerves are shattered from the experiences through which they have passed. Many of those taken away will not live a great while, as they are badly wounded or much enfeebled by hunger. Two hundred died on one of the relief ships while they were being transported to Naples. The condition of those who are able to walk off the steamers, when they reach that city, would cause the most hardened to burst into tears. Most of them have only one or two garments. Some of the men have only an old skirt thrown about them, and the women are glad to get the cast-off cloak of a gendarme.

King Victor Emmanuel has told his impressions of the scenes through which, accompanied by Queen Helena, he passed while visiting Reggio and the surrounding districts. He saw thousands who had become insane through hunger, suffering and the loss of their loved ones. They rolled upon the ground in abject despair. Many were almost naked, their limbs exposed to the cold rain and the pitiless wind. Most of all, the silent misery of the multitudes of orphan children appealed to him. The Queen, amid her sobs, told of scenes that would move the stoniest heart. One young girl she saw, who had gone mad with grief, was singing and bowing, in a heap of ruins, while the bodies of her loved ones lay at her feet.

Father John of Cronstadt

Hon. H. L. Satterlee, Asst. Secy. U. S. Navy

Judge Rufus Hildreth Thayer

Hon. W. I. Buchanan, Envoy to Venezuela

KNOWN throughout Eastern Europe, and especially beloved in his native Russia, Father John, the famous apostle of the Russian Church, passed away in St. Petersburg lately, after a lingering illness, at the patriarchal age of eighty years. Miraculous powers were ascribed to him, and it was said that he had raised from the dead a girl in a cancer hospital at St. Petersburg. His home in Cronstadt was a Mecca for pilgrimages by the faithful. It was not merely among the lowly that he was revered. The late Emperor Alexander III. honored and befriended him.

His real name was Ivan Sergeiff, but he was known to all as Father John. For the last quarter of a century he has stood out vividly as a great national character, everywhere loved and trusted for the purity of his life, for his wise counsel and his great benevolence. In his church he was a leader, and he urged missionary endeavors in foreign fields. He was the founder of a home for the aged and infirm, and he aided with his money and influence a number of worthy benevolent enterprises.

One of the most recent appointments made by President Roosevelt is that of Herbert Livingston Satterlee, of New York, as Assistant Secretary of the Navy, in place of Mr. Newberry, who has just been promoted to the office of Secretary. Mr. Satterlee comes of a family which has long been identified with the military and civil affairs of the country, and he himself has served in the naval militia and in the national forces during the war with Spain. One of his ancestors, Lieutenant-Colonel Benedict Satterlee, was killed in the massacre at Wyoming.

Mr. Satterlee was born in New York in 1863. He studied at Columbia College, and in 1885 he was admitted to the New York bar. The next year he got his first glimpse into public life, becoming the secretary of Senator Evarts, a position he held for two years, when he again returned to the active practice of law. He was one of the organizers of the Naval Battalion of the New York National Guard, and was ordnance officer and navigator of the command. He was naval aid to Governor Levi P. Morton in 1895 and 1896. Mr. Satterlee was among the first to volunteer at the opening of the war with Spain. He was one of the organizers of the Naval Reserve Association, and is an officer of the Naval League. He is an Episcopalian in his church affiliations. His father was a cousin of the first Bishop of Washington.

Judge Rufus Hildreth Thayer, of Washington, D. C., will preside for some years over the United States Court at Shanghai, having been appointed to the post by President Roosevelt, who has long been an admirer of Judge Thayer's ability as a jurist. The judge was born in Plymouth, Mich., in 1850. He had the usual experience of the American farmer's boy, then went through the public schools and the University of Michigan. He is a member of the United States Court of Claims and of the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States. He is interested in education, and served for a long time on the Washington School Board and is one of the trustees of the Washington Public Library.

Mrs. Thayer was Miss Harriet I. Barnes, of Albany, N. Y. She is an artist of note, and her pictures have been exhibited in Paris and several American cities.

It now looks as if there is a fair prospect of a settlement of the long-standing disputes between the United States and Venezuela. Hon. W. I. Buchanan, the special commissioner of the United States, is now in Caracas, and the negotiations are said to be going on smoothly. He has had much experience in handling uncomfortable diplomatic questions with the South American countries. He was the first American Minister to Panama.

TWELVE THOUSAND HOLD "WATCH NIGHT"

CHICAGO has given birth during the past sixty days to a new and altogether unique plan of Gospel campaigning. The movement began early in November, in a number of the aggressive evangelical churches of the city, and culminated on New Year's Eve in a monster Watch Night meeting in the Coliseum, lasting nearly five hours and attended by over 12,000 people.

The campaign was known as the Gospel Song Evangelistic Movement. Not a paid worker of any kind was employed—singer, preacher, or evangelist. Over 250 churches united, and scores, not to say hundreds, of services were held in all parts of the city, with conversions at almost every service.

The movement was originally conceived by Rev. A. C. Dixon, pastor of the Moody Church, well known as one of the most aggressive churches in America. Dr. Dixon had long observed that the Sunday evening meetings of Gospel song, held once a month in his church, had attracted unusually large audiences and resulted in many conversions. "If there is such power in Gospel song to attract and impress multitudes, why not inaugurate a general evangelistic movement of Gospel song?" he inquired. He conferred with other pastors, and they heartily approved. Then he invited all the evangelical ministers of the city to a luncheon, and the two hundred or more who were present also approved the plan and organized for the campaign. Dr. Dixon was asked to head the movement, and Rev. W. R. Marshall and Messrs. E. A. Marshall and E. Y. Woolley were appointed secretaries. Dr. D. B. Towner was made director of the music, with Professor E. O. Excell assistant. Over thirty groups of churches, representing ten or more denominations and averaging seven or eight churches to each group, were formed in various sections of the city.

Two days of the campaign, one at the beginning and another shortly before the great meeting at the Coliseum, were given over entirely to fasting and prayer, with union prayer services on each day, lasting from 10 A.M. to 5 P.M., without intermission, except what was necessary for change of leaders. Thousands of people all over the city were drawn to the meetings, and hundreds were converted, including many drunkards, infidels and outcasts. One of the greatest benefits of the movement was to the smaller churches of the city, many of which were revived and inspired with new zeal.

The great meeting at the Coliseum was one long to be remembered. In this historic hall were gathered on New Year's Eve the spiritual element of all the evangelical churches of the city. It had been announced that the doors would open at seven o'clock and services begin at eight, but by five the people were beginning to gather, and shortly after the doors were opened every seat was occupied. Extra trains were run from several of the surrounding towns (Elgin, Kankakee, and other places) to accommodate the incoming throngs. Overflow meetings were conducted in near-by churches, and these, too, were well attended.

The principal speakers of the evening were Mr. Marion Lawrance and Drs. W. E. Biederwolf, L. W. Munhall and J. Wilbur Chapman. Dr. Dixon presided, and Dr. Towner led the vast choir of nearly 3,000 voices. It is doubtful whether such a great Gospel chorus as this was ever seen before in all the history of evangelism. It was declared by the evangelists to have been the largest that ever assembled in America.

Dr. Towner and his great chorus were at their best on this occasion. How those Gospel hymns, sung for almost an hour without rest or intermission, did fill and thrill the vast audience!

In the picture Dr. A. C. Dixon stands in the centre of the platform. He presided. At his right and next to him is Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, then W. E. Biederwolf and Dr. F. D. Burhans (Chicago). On his left are Bishop Samuel Fallows, Dr. L. W. Munhall, Dr. James M. Phelps, Rev. Mr. Cleworth and Dr. John A. Earl, and other prominent leaders in the movement.

Each of the evangelists appealed with great earnestness to the unsaved to forsake the old life and enter the new year on the side of Christ, and many responded. Christians were exhorted to reconsecrate themselves and to make 1909 the greatest soul-winning year of their lives. Twelve thousand copies of a "Souvenir Leaflet" had been prepared for distribution, on the first page of which were the following touching verses:

He came to my desk with a quivering lip—
The lesson was done—
"Dear teacher, I want a new leaf," he said,
"I have spoiled this one."
In place of the leaf so stained and blotted,
I gave him a new one all unspotted,
And into his sad eyes smiled—
"Do better now, my child."

I went to the Throne with a quivering soul—
The old year was done—
"Dear Father, hast thou a new leaf for me?
I have spoiled this one."
He took the old leaf, stained and blotted,
And gave me a new one all unspotted;
And into my sad heart smiled—
"Do better now, my child."

The second page contained the "Watch Night Covenant":

and for all the time to come, I surrender all to God and will endeavor in his strength to do his will as revealed in the Word through the Holy Spirit. I will publicly and privately, as I have opportunity, by both word and deed, confess him as my Lord and Master; I will have a daily prayer list and will endeavor, God being my helper, to lead at least one soul to Christ during each month of 1909.

Signed .....

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman made the closing address, and, in response to his appeal, nearly half a hundred persons throughout the great audience signified their intention of beginning the new year as followers of Christ.

The influence, not alone of this one meeting, but of the entire movement, has been, and continues to be, far extended. Inquiries for detailed information have come in from various sections of the country, and it is possible that the movement will become ere long nation-wide in its extent. But Dr. Dixon, and those associated with him in Chicago, unite in giving all the glory to God for its success.

The New Bankers of the Country

IT USED to be the custom for those engaged in mercantile pursuits to regard the life of a farmer as an uninteresting one, and rather pity him for his long hours and poor returns, and wonder why he did not turn his hand to a more lucrative occupation. If there are any left who have the impression that the farmers of the country are not so prosperous, as a class, as any other in the community they should read the latest report of Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Agriculture. They will find that the American farmer is not well back in the procession of producers, but is leading it. In fact, he is the most important factor for the last year, and will probably be so during the year to come.

The value of what the farmers produced in twelve months reaches the stupendous figure of eight billion dollars. This is over four times the value of the output for the same period of all the oil wells, gold, silver, copper, iron and coal mines in the United States. Over eighty-seven per cent. of all the raw material used in manufacturing was supplied by the farms, leaving but a small thirteen per cent. from other sources, including what was imported from abroad. In ten years, the report says, the wealth created by the farms reaches the sum of $60,000,000.

Political economists rightly claim that the only true prosperity of a country can be gauged by the amount that is produced from its own soil. The manufacturer now asks how things are going with the farmer, and if they are going well he predicts a prosperous year in his own business. Recently the purchasing power of those engaged in manufacturing and commerce has been somewhat reduced, but it is more than compensated for by the increased purchasing power of those engaged in agriculture. One national bank president said recently: "Upon the crops rests the continued prosperity of America. The farmers are now the bankers of the country, for they have the money to loan."

Evidently the boy who agreed to remain on the farm, while his brother went off to try to win his fortune in the great cities, did not make such a bad bargain after all.

Following Jesus

EVER since the days of the apostles, the divine command to "follow Jesus" has been sounding throughout the Christian world. In many lands, there have been those who have heard it and have interpreted it aright in their daily lives and actions. Falling far short of the sublime Ideal, they have yet attained, by self-sacrifice and complete consecration, a spiritual altitude impossible to those who, however admirable their lives outwardly appeared, regarded worldly success as the prime aim and object of human existence.

These observations are suggested by the intelligence of a unique movement which has lately been begun in Ohio. A young man named Price is the originator, and at large meetings where he has spoken, he has urged his hearers to try the experiment of living for two weeks "as Christ would have lived were he on earth." At one of the meetings a report was made that 10,000 young people of both sexes had pledged themselves to walk in Christ's footsteps more closely than they had ever done before. By a strange coincidence, the news comes from India almost simultaneously of the organization of a "Society of the Brotherhood of the Imitation of Jesus," the members of which pledge themselves to become "servants of all" and to go out among the afflicted, the plague-stricken, the lepers and sufferers from contagion.

To live as Jesus would have us live, or as he himself would live—that should be the highest and dearest desire of every one who is a true disciple of the world's Redeemer. But are we ready for all the sacrifice, the self-crucifixion, the self-denial, the humiliation in the eyes of men, that it implies? For his sake, are we willing to bear the cross? Are we content to let the world go by, and to trust him for all things? Can we separate ourselves from all of our petty jealousies, our misrepresentations, our worldly business methods, which are so often unscrupulous? Can we shake off our indulgences like a garment, and dedicate our bodies as pure temples in which the Spirit may dwell? Yet these and many more problems must be faced and solved, if we would live "as He would have lived."

We believe that in this land of ours there are multitudes who are following Jesus, earnestly and humbly. They, like others, may fall far short of their glorious Ideal; but they are his disciples nevertheless, leaning upon him and interpreting him in their daily lives. Through long-continued stress and struggle, amid many limitations, they learn the impossibility of a perfect human copy of the Master; but they are not discouraged. It is his hand that raises them when they stumble and fall, his voice that speaks consolation to their souls as they again set their faces heavenward. They may belong to the humblest of earth, their mission a limited one, their horizon narrow, their opportunities of well-doing so small that they may never become known much beyond their own firesides. Yet if they live near to Christ, seeking earnestly to know his will, and spending themselves gladly for others, though their experience may not be spectacular, they will be accounted among those who lead a "tranquil and quiet life in all godliness and gravity," which we are assured is "good and acceptable" in his sight.

Send Your Gift to Italy To-Day

IT HAS been the privilege of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in past years to be foremost in rendering assistance on fields of suffering, and the prompt aid they gave on these occasions is to-day recalled in unnumbered homes in other lands, as well as our own. Their service then so freely done is a crown of glory that cannot fade, and their golden-hearted charity will ever be held in grateful remembrance. This journal has been their chosen channel of benevolence, and it is the highest honor they could have paid it to make it their almoner to the poor, the distressed, the plague-smitten, the famine-stricken.

It is once more at their disposal for sending their gifts to the suffering. The $20,000 which the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cabled to Italy, immediately after the frightful earthquake disaster, was transformed into food and medicine ere the news was two days' old, and the result of this promptitude will show that many poor survivors owe their lives to that quick relief. The second advance remittance of $30,000—represented in the food cargo of the steamship Bayern—is now being distributed among the homeless and destitute survivors in the towns and villages along the Calabrian coast.

Money sent now has a tenfold value. Every dollar received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund goes undiminished to the sufferers by the cable. Even a dime may save one life; a dollar may be the instrument of snatching a whole family from imminent peril of starvation. From your abundance you can easily spare a gift for Italy. These sufferers are our brothers and sisters. They are not heathen. Their cry to the pitiful Father and to the Saviour for help ascends amid their ruined homes. Let us reach out with fervent prayer and with hands of succor, and God will surely send his blessing.

Send in your gift Now to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund. Every offering, however small, will be acknowledged in these pages. We would urge every reader to make haste to save one life. It is the King's business, and his command should not be permitted to pass unheeded.

THE inauguration of the new President takes place March 4. Your interest in this national event will be greatly enhanced if you possess a copy of the "Inside History of the White House." Nations Clasping Hands

AN unanswerable argument in support of the growth of the peace movement is furnished in a table of arbitration treaties, concluded within the last ten years between almost all the governments of the world, which has just been compiled and published by the American Journal of International Law. According to this instructive exhibit, the number of treaties concluded is as follows:

Argentina	5	Japan	1
Austro-Hungary	3	Mexico	2
Belgium	7	Netherlands	5
Bolivia	2	Norway	2
Brazil	1	Norway and Sweden	2
Chile	1	Paraguay	1
Colombia	2	Peru	3
Denmark	9	Portugal	10
France	10	Roumania	1
Germany	1	Russia	3
Great Britain	11	Spain	14
Greece	1	United States	12
Guatemala	1	Uruguay	1
Honduras	1	Sweden	2
Italy	9	Switzerland	8

In a majority of cases, these treaties provide for the submission to the Hague Court of all disputes arising between the signatories, except where they affect their independence, honor, vital interests or sovereignty. It can easily be understood how any government, determined to make war upon another, might evade accountability to the Hague Court, for the pledge, after all, is one the inviolability of which must depend wholly upon national honor and good faith in every instance. Now that the arbitration movement is so general, however, a wholesome regard for international public opinion will go far toward preventing undue aggression. Every such treaty is a blow at war.

WITH OUR COMPLIMENTS

WE HAVE received a number of inquiries as to whether subscribers may exchange our Art Gallery De Luxe unmounted for the mounted pictures, if they now send us the 50 cents and return the unmounted pictures.

To these inquiries we would reply that any of our subscribers who desire a set of the pictures mounted may have them—even though they already possess an unmounted set—by simply sending us the 50 cents required for the former. It is not necessary to return the first set of pictures.

On receipt of the 50 cents we will send the six exquisite reproductions comprising our Art Gallery De Luxe, handsomely mounted on rich art paper, size 16x20 inches, done up between corrugated boards and delivered flat and in absolutely undamaged condition. We believe that the mounting and flat delivery of the pictures adds $10 to their value, notwithstanding the fact that they are otherwise identical with the set sent free with every annual subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

To order the mounted pictures simply send the 50 cents, with your name and address written plainly, and state "For mounted pictures." No further explanation is required, and the set of pictures you already possess you may keep, with our compliments. Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York City.

Chinese Visit Washington's Tomb

THE return of the indemnity money to China, by the United States, awakened the deepest gratitude in the hearts of the people of the Celestial Empire. In recognition of the gracious act by our government, the Emperor sent a delegation from Peking to Washington to express to our government, through President Roosevelt, the national gratitude, and to make known the fact that the money returned would be employed in the education of Chinese students in this country. And as an evidence of good faith, a delegation of students accompanied the imperial messengers on their pilgrimage to Washington. These distinguished governmental representatives, and the students accompanying them, visited the tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon in a body, and, in a formal but most sincere manner, paid homage to the founder of the nation.

General Grant, in his tour around the world, did very much toward enlightening the leaders of China with reference to American history, institutions and greatness. Li Hung Chang, the real ruler of China, got from him many new ideas with reference to liberty and reform, and the nation has ever since been moving rapidly upward in the scale of civilization. Yuan Shih Kai, the commander-in-chief of the military and naval forces of China and the foremost statesman of the empire, was the other day suddenly ordered out of office and sent home in disgrace. As he has been such a friend to the English-speaking nations, and the acknowledged exponent of governmental reform, many have feared that the progress of China would be retarded. This will not be the case. China has caught the spirit of the times, is awakening, and will give her people a Constitution and a Parliament—according to imperial promise. And nothing could be more beautiful and significant than for the official representatives of the Chinese government, and the young men who are being fitted to lead in national counsels, to pay their homage at the tomb of the father of our free country. The adoption of the habits and liberty of the West by China is emblematic of its movement toward Christ and his cross and prophetic of that day when all the nations of the earth will be parts of God's great family.

Seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him. (Gen. 18 : 18.)

Distinguished Chinese Placing a Wreath on Washington's Tomb

Poisoned the Sea

There was a ship lying at the wharf at Tanjong Pagar, in India, which had a tank that leaked. Into this tank water had been pumped and preparation was made for putting out to sea. But the pump leaked away gradually into the hold, where there was a large amount of cyanide of potassium. Before the mishap was discovered, there was about three feet of deadly solution in the hold. Pumps were immediately set to work and the poisonous fluid was thrown into the sea. Dead fish in every direction came to the top of the water. The solution was so deadly that there was enough poison in all of it to kill every resident in Singapore.

What a polluting power there is in an evil thought or life! It is fatal to the highest thought and the holiest ambition. The provisions of divine grace and the labors of God's children are employed in preventing this pollution of the individual and society by the insidious poison of moral evil.

Because it is polluted, it shall destroy you, even with a sore destruction. (Micah 2 : 10.)

Help Me Find Myself

There is a man in Grace Hospital, New Haven, Conn., who cries continually: "Help me to find myself." He said: "I don't know my name: I don't know where I live, nor whether I am married, nor what my business is. In fact, I am lost so far as knowing myself goes." When efforts to pierce the strange veil which shrouds his mind fails, he talks about flowers and agriculture like an expert botanist. He can speak German and French as fluently as English. When taken to the hospital he was well dressed, but had only thirty-four cents in his pocket. He was in a semi-stupor, but was not intoxicated, and a scar on his scalp showed that he had suffered a fracture of the skull, perhaps a year or two ago. His skull was trepanned again recently, and while it relieved him of delirium it did not restore his memory. Many persons are so dizzy and dazed by the whirl of this world, and the sweep of its temptations and its alluring vices, that they lose themselves. They do not realize who they are, or where they are, or whither they are going. Some divine power is needed to alarm them and bring them to themselves.

And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger! I will arise and go to my father. (Luke 15 : 17, 18.)

The Baby Went to Sleep

Mrs. Jennie Francis, of Brooklyn, was too poor to hire a physician to attend her sick child, and so she took the babe in her arms and started for St. Catherine Hospital, where her little one might have medical attention. As the burden was heavy, she sat down on the stone step of a residence on Bushwick Avenue for a moment's rest. The child being ill and in great pain, the mother undertook to sing it to sleep. After she had been singing a little while, a gentleman came along the street close enough to look into the face of the child, and he said to the mother: "Little woman, your baby is dead!" Mrs. Francis jumped to her feet and screamed, "Don't say that! Don't say that! It can't be true! It is not true!" She and the dead child were taken back to her home, and the mother seemed inconsolable in the surprise and intensity of her bereavement.

The little child of poverty grew tired of the race before its feet had gotten started on life's road. It grew weary of the conflict before it had had an opportunity to enter the field of battle. The little creature went to sleep, sure enough, upon its mother's breast, and awoke in the arms of the Blessed Saviour. The early Christians called death a sleep, and named the cities of their dead "cemeteries," or sleeping places. Mothers, whether they live in palaces or in cottages of poverty, who have faith in Christ, know that their little ones are not dead, but sleeping, and in the morning they shall meet and claim them as their own.

The sacred scribe closes the account of the horrible death of Stephen with the statement that he had fallen asleep.

And he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. And when he had said this, he fell asleep. (Acts 7 : 60.)

A Saloonkeepers' Church

Rev. Fred P. Kurtz has formed, in the city of Baltimore, St. Luke's Church of the New Dispensation, a unique congregation composed of about 100 saloonkeepers. This organization will oppose prohibition and local option legislation. The affiliated saloonkeepers will support the church, and the pastor will help them in resisting adverse legislation. The pastor, in his public declaration, says he intends to drive the Anti-Saloon League out of Maryland, and put an end to its warfare against the liquor saloon.

Na-Tung, Successor of Yuan Shih Kai

Of all the strange and contradictory things done by most strange and contradictory churches, it is impossible to think of a parody greater than that of this church having the whisky cask and beer barrel as the foundation of a barkeepers' union, under the pretense of a religious organization promoting morality and virtue. It comes more nearly being an illustration of the complete twisting of a conscience than anything that has appeared for a long time. How far away from God and good people must they be to call evil good, and good evil!

Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter! (Isa. 5: 20.)

Will Set Tramps to Work

Tramps and others, who wish to keep quarters at the expense of New York City, will have to break stone or gather up paper from the street in bags for their lodging and food. The municipal lodging house at First Avenue and Twenty-third Street cares for 300 men a night, and the new building at the foot of East Twenty-fifth Street is to have accommodation for a thousand men and women. Robert W. Hebbard, the Commissioner of Charities, has put a new scheme into operation. The men are examined at the lodging house by a competent physician; those who are most able to work are put on the stone pile and those who are not so strong are given a large bag, which they are compelled to fill in taking pieces of paper off the streets, not interfering in any way with the street cleaners. For this work the men will receive three meals a day and a lodging, the meals to consist of oatmeal, coffee and bread for breakfast; bread and stew or soup for dinner, and coffee and bread for supper. Blackwell's Island is to be beautified, not only with new buildings, but an elaborate system of parks, drives and walks, all surrounded with highways made of broken stone, and these idle men will be employed at this task.

This is as it should be. There is no benevolence that is more genuine than that of helping a man to help himself, and where there is the least spark of manhood left the unemployed craves work rather than charity.

In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread. (Gen. 3: 19.)

Paper from Cornstalks

Dr. B. T. Galloway, of the Bureau of Plant Industry of the Department of Agriculture, stated to the House Committee on Agriculture, recently, that laboratory tests seem to warrant the conclusion that print paper could be manufactured from cornstalks, the same as from wood pulp at the present time. There is a mill in Maine which is to make a test of the commercial value of the new product. The product of the plant is a cheap kind of molasses and the stalk is to be torn into shreds and made into paper. Science is busying itself in utilizing the waste forces and elements in nature. Things that used to be thrown away from the foundries, factories, slaughter-houses, and the like, are now making fortunes for men and corporations. The utilization of waste forces in the world of the mind and of the heart is of the greatest importance. The employment of idle moments and idle energy in individual character and in the church is of paramount importance. After the Saviour had fed the multitude with such prodigality, with the loaves and the fishes, he took especial precaution that nothing should be wasted.

Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost. (John 6 : 12.)

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

Concerning a Grandmother

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE child who has never known the delight of having a grandmother has been robbed of part of its birthright. Every child ought to come into the world in this period of longevity with at least two grandmothers, and there is no reason why in favoring circumstances it might not have two great-grandmothers, the latter still young enough to take pleasure in life and to pet and indulge the new generation. One beautiful matron, whom the writer of this knows, is a great-great-grandmother. If she lives five years longer she will have rounded out a century, and at present she is hale and hearty, reads, knits, visits the neighbors and enjoys three meals a day, while she may boast of a health record that has had no interruption in the last thirty years. This is certainly wonderful, and indicates on the part of this dear lady not alone abundant vitality, but a fund of good temper, equable nerves and trust in God. How proud her descendants must be of this venerable mother, who has so fully adorned her station, and whose sunset days are so serene and sweet! We are told that she has been a devoted reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and we are complimented by her intelligent interest and gentle approval.

Speaking of grandmothers, we often hear mothers account for the patience and sympathy that the elder women display to children by the explanation that grandmother has only the pleasure, and not the responsibility, of the relation between children and the home. This is only partially true. Grandmothers have lived long enough to understand children much better than younger people do. They have found out that a lot of discipline is worse than wasted in juvenile education, and that the chief use of punishment is to focus childish attention on a fault. A grandmother to whose house a child may go is a greater boon than a grandmother living under the parental roof. She usually has goodies in her pantry, in the shape of cake, doughnuts and cookies, to which she gives a growing child freer access than he has at home, and she is ready to take his part and speak a word for him in season, if he has made a mistake or drifted into a false position. There are exceptional grandmothers whose rule is rigid, and who repel rather than attract children, but fortunately they are in the minority. Grandmother is generally a refuge and not a terror, a protector and not a police agent.

It would be interesting to know what steps have led the West Virginia dame, whom it is our pleasure to honor, to her present altitude of years, with vigor so unimpaired. One may be sure that she has never wilfully broken the laws of health, that she has lived simply and temperately, and that those hands of hers have wrought well and faithfully from childhood to old age. How many times they have nursed the sick, how often smoothed the pillow of the dying, how tenderly cared for little children! There is a world of beauty and of pathos in the story told by the hands of such a woman.

A CHILD'S DELIGHT

THE world over, little children love flowers. The dimpled hand of the peasant lassie holds fast her prize with the same delight that our little ones feel when bright blossoms are in their possession. A child cares more for a flower than a queen cares for a diamond. Happiness thrills in this baby's breast. Her elder sister, short as her young life has been, has evidently seen flowers droop and die, and she watches the little one with a pensive air that moves us to sympathy.

Schoolroom Ventilation

Writing to a daily newspaper the other day, a mother complained that her delicate little girl, a pupil in a city school, was being slowly poisoned by bad air. The crowded public schools of the great city were ventilated by a system that did not succeed in doing what was claimed for it. Although it possibly brought fresh air into the rooms, it did not expel the tainted air that had been breathed over and over by scores of little ones. Some of these children were dirty, some had colds and catarrhs, many were anæmic, and all were exposed to the peril of breathing in a badly ventilated schoolroom for five or six hours of the day. "The teachers suffered even more than the children," said the mother, who had visited a number of classrooms with the object of making investigations. Formerly schoolrooms were ventilated by the simple method of raising windows from the bottom and letting them down from the top. By this primitive means currents of fresh air were easily introduced, and during a recess or a noon spell a school could be thoroughly renovated and the air rendered innocuous. When this method was in vogue we often heard lamentations about the danger of taking cold when exposed to draughts. Yet, as cold air is far less perilous than bad air, the probability is that the children of other days were better off than those of to-day in this particular.

What is imperatively needed in every classroom where children are expected to do good work is a continual supply of pure, unvitiated air.

Steamer Letters

A PRETTY custom of the day is to prepare for friends going abroad a succession of steamer letters, that they may read day by day until they are across the ocean. These letters are not always written by the same person, but are usually gathered by one friend, who asks a group to contribute to the budget, and then arranges them in order in an envelope, which may be handed to the voyager before she starts or sent by post to the steamer in time to reach it the day before it sails. Every step in life to-day gives an opportunity for friendship to pay some delicate attention to the object of its love, and steamer letters are among the most graceful presents that can be offered to some one who is to be at a distance for a while. Flowers and fruit are in order, too, as are books, air-cushions and other little devices for comfort and entertainment. A letter, however, has a personal touch, and conveys a pleasing sentiment, while it entails upon the recipient no greater responsibility by way of return and acknowledgment than the sending home of a picture post-card. These steamer letters are sometimes collections of limericks, are again illustrated by pen and ink sketches, or may be composed of bits of poetry, stories and pictures cut from magazines and papers. Such a surprise was recently planned by her friends for a popular girl who was going abroad for the first time. The variety and pleasantry of the letters must have made the week on the ocean very charming with thoughts of home. There was expressed in one of the letters a hope that the party of the second part would keep a diary for the benefit of the parties of the first part, and read it on her return next autumn to the entire group at a luncheon or afternoon tea.

Oriental Students in America

A noteworthy sign of the times is the presence among us, in our colleges and universities, of a large number of Oriental students of both sexes. Recently two of the most distinguished prize winners at Yale were respectively a Chinese and a Turkish student. Columbia University is justly proud of a Chinese who has taken the front rank in everything that he has attempted since he entered her classes. The students who come to us from the Far East show brilliant mental powers, great ambition and a capacity for application that might well put some of our own young people to the blush. They will carry back to their own countries the fruits of their sojourn here, for it is their intention to light the torch of Western learning, or to practice liberal professions, in their own homes in coming days. Would that they might carry with them not merely civilization and wide learning, but Christianity of the highest type! It would seem that an immense responsibility rested upon us when the flower of non-Christian youth actually enters our doors, is matriculated in our higher institutions, and comes into the atmosphere of our Christian culture. Yet it is far from being the case that we impress these students with the truth and beauty of the Christian religion. We send our finest men and women into the foreign field, that they may tell those who sit in darkness of the true light. When from the other side of the globe those people send their children to us, should we not all be missionaries by example as well as precept? If we deliberately lose our chance of helping them, how shall we answer for it in the day of accounting?

The Gospel Still a Power

REV. CHARLES A. EATON, D.D., who has accepted the call to the pastorate of the Madison Avenue Baptist Church, New York City, during the past seven years has accomplished a remarkable work in Cleveland, O. From the beginning of his pastorate, he found time to preach to the crowds upon the Cleveland public square, using a box for a platform. From street corners he has invited the people of the thoroughfare to join in the services of the Euclid Avenue Baptist Church, with the result that the evening services, which at one time were attended by but few, now tax the seating capacity of the great auditorium. One week lately he talked from the stage of a downtown theatre at noon time. By the simple Gospel message he has moved audiences as few preachers of the Middle West have done. He has spoken to labor lyceums, his chief thought being to instil the religious side into all social problems and economic movements.

Rev. Charles A. Eaton, D.D.

Euclid Avenue Baptist Church conducts two large missions. The main church is open day and night, furnishing a home and home activities for those who live in boarding houses and hotels. There are forty services a week. There is a men's club of 700 members and a Sunday Morning Bible Class of men of 100. The prayer meetings have been notable, with never less than 300, and sometimes 500 to 600.

"Men to-day," says Dr. Eaton, "are hungry for the Gospel of Jesus Christ. I could preach to the same congregation fourteen times a week, and always have something fresh and new, because Jesus Christ is an inexhaustible theme."

It is said that in his new pastorate, in New York, the church will be one where rich and poor alike may receive spiritual and moral uplift.

THE TRIAL OF PETER AND JOHN

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE influence which Peter and John were gaining over the people was such that the authorities began to take alarm. The poor despised followers of the lately-crucified Jesus of Nazareth were teaching the people with a power which was almost irresistible. Their doctrines offended the priests, for they "preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead." Did not the priests teach resurrection? Surely, but in lifeless words. Peter and John preached about a Man, Jesus of Nazareth, who had, but a few weeks past, arisen by his own power from the dead, and they appealed to many witnesses present. This was fatal to the cause of the priests, for, by their condemnation, this Man had been given over to death; all the ecclesiastical reputation of Jerusalem hung on the proof that Jesus was an impostor.

What were they to do? Stop the preaching at all costs. This they did, and put the offending disciples in prison for the night. But they could not imprison the Holy Ghost, who had spoken through them, and who was working among the people. "Many of them which heard the Word believed; and the number of the men was about five thousand."

No doubt Peter and John, in prison, rested like little children in their Father's arms. The priests must have been up most of the night, in order to get together the company they convoked; "their rulers, and elders, and scribes, and Annas the high priest, and Caiaphas, and John, and Alexander, and as many as were of the kindred of the high priest." In the morning, when they had set their prisoners in the midst, this august council asked the two disciples, "By what power, or by what name, have ye done this?" They knew of the temporal power of the Jewish priesthood, but the manifest power of God they knew not. Peter boldly declared to them that it was "by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, and whom God raised from the dead," that they were healing those who had been pronounced incurable. Peter would not take the smallest degree of credit to himself. They were obliged to listen to his bold, outspoken words. He went on preaching a sermon to the priests: "This is the stone which was set at naught of you builders, which is become the head of the corner. Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." Blessed be God! We are coming to know more and more of it yet! God has joined together salvation and the name of Jesus—let not man put them asunder. God's salvation is an all-inclusive one, embracing past, present, future; spirit, soul, and body; yes, more—family, occupation, circumstances; we need a salvation which includes all. The authority of the whole universe is given to Jesus, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28:18). And He places illimitable power at our disposal, as we renounce our own power, and forsake our own name, becoming nothing for his sake. There is no second Jesus, there is salvation in none other, and those who seek for it through the prayers of others, or through their own good deeds, or through the membership of churches, find that none of these things, good as they are, can be substitutes for the name of Jesus.

When this assembly of learned divines "saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men, they marveled, and they took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus": this was the secret. Jesus thought not of himself; he yielded himself up as a channel between his Father and those whom he came to save. And the same spirit animated these two disciples: "they had been with Jesus." Oh that it could be said of every Christian man and woman, when anything uncommon is remarked in them, "They have been with Jesus; they are so like him; they bring his presence with them wherever they come!"

A Nurse Writes:

There is so much bad Castile soap on the market I always recommend Ivory for everything, even for infant's bath and washing infant's clothes. Never find any bad effect. It does not change the color, which is a valuable item. I do wish washerwomen and laundries would use it entirely, as they do waste so many pretty-colored garments by using the old alkali soaps. I believe that is one of the main reasons why ladies have had to give up colored shirt waists and dresses and adopt white.

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IT was the hall of the great Sanhedrin,† the Supreme Court of the Jewish people. It adjoined the temple. It was of hewn stone, and it opened into the Court of the Priests. In this same court was the brazen altar for burnt offerings. The seats, seventy-one in number, were arranged in the form of a semi-circle. The High Priest sat in the centre; at each end was a scribe, who took notes of the proceedings. The bar, where both prisoners and witnesses were brought, was the central space. Almost every town of any size had its local Sanhedrin, numbering from three to twenty-three members, according to population.

Noted Prisoners Before the Sanhedrin

They were the apostles Peter and John, who had been apprehended while preaching to the people in Solomon's Porch after the healing of the lame man at the Gate Beautiful. They were kept in prison over night, because the Sanhedrin could not lawfully sit but in the daylight. The only charge brought against them was that the resurrection of Jesus was the theme of their discourse.

Jesus himself had stood in that same court room, and probably before many of the same Sanhedrists. If so, they were the very men who had condemned Jesus to death, but did not dare to carry out their sentence, even when Pilate told them to do as they pleased with Jesus. These facts did not intimidate Peter and John; on the contrary, they were reminded of what Jesus had said: "A servant is not greater than his lord. If they persecute me, they will also persecute you." And these words gave them strength and courage.

The Sanhedrists recognized the strange power of Peter and John, for it is said that they took knowledge of them that "they had been with Jesus." They recognized a superiority in word and manner, which did not belong to uneducated fishermen, as they knew Peter and John to be.

The Gospel Preached to the Sanhedrin

It was indeed a strange place in which to utter such a message. The preacher was Peter, whose boldness had become consecrated. The prelude to the sermon was a reference to the good deed that had been done in healing the lame man in the name of Jesus. They could not deny the healing, for with Peter and John stood the man himself. Probably Peter spoke at some length concerning the matter, and then came the stinging rebuke, "The same Jesus whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even in him doth this man stand here whole." The Sanhedrists were almost ready to attack the preacher. But he desisted not, and put an illustration in his sermon, which placed the highest honor upon Jesus. The preacher reminded them of that wondrously carved stone about which there had been so much rejoicing when it had been lifted to its place to complete the building of the temple, the headstone of the corner, the most honored stone in the whole temple, and with that stone Peter compared Jesus. There was sarcasm in his reference to the builders of the temple, who in their ignorance had for a long time let that stone lay upon the ground, wholly unable to determine its use. And Peter plainly said to the Sanhedrists, "Jesus is the stone which was set at nought of you, the builders."

And then Peter boldly declared the Gospel message: that only in the name of Jesus is salvation to be found. The Sanhedrists were in the mood of condemning Peter to death, as they had done Jesus, but they recognized that the apostles of Jesus had become popular, that even while the arrest and trial were going on the influence of their prisoners had caused two thousand more persons to be added to the Church of Jesus Christ, so that there were now five thousand converts in all. "All men glorified God for that which was done."

The Sanhedrists could not deny what had been done in the healing of the lame man; they were afraid of the people, and the only way out, as it seemed to them, was to charge Peter and John that they should henceforth not speak of Jesus to the people! It was the height of folly, the weak action of men in a dilemma.

It was the great Sanhedrin that had rendered the verdict, but Peter and John appealed their case to the higher court of heaven: "Whether it is right, in the sight of God, to hearken unto you rather than unto God." And so Peter and John took themselves out of the jurisdiction of the Sanhedrists, saying: "We cannot but speak the things which we saw and heard." "And they let them go."

Two Courageous Men

Peter and John, when they left the court of the Sanhedrin, went directly to a house where they knew that the other apostles and their friends were gathered together praying for them. And there they prayed for themselves:

> And now, Lord, behold their threatenings: and grant unto thy servants, that with all boldness they may speak thy word, by stretching forth thine hand to heal; and that signs and wonders may be done by the name of thy holy child Jesus.

And God answered their prayer by another manifestation of the Holy Spirit, so that the place where they were was shaken.

I like the man who faces what he must,
With a step triumphant, and a heart of cheer,
Who fights the daily battle without fear,
Sees his hopes fail, yet keeps the unfaltering trust—
That God is God; that somehow, true and just,
His plans work out for mortals; not a tear
Is shed when fortune, which the world holds dear,
Falls from his grasp; better, with love, a crust
Than living with dishonor; envies not
Nor loses faith in man; but does his best,
Nor ever murmurs at his humble lot,
But with his smile and words of hope, gives zest
To every toiler; he alone is great
Who by a life heroic conquers fate.

Let us be reminded that when the Sanhedrists beheld the boldness of Peter and John, they wondered at their wise words and fearless, dignified bearing, and they could account for their superiority in no other way than that "they had been with Jesus." In their conduct was mirrored the serene courage of Jesus, who had stood in that very court only a few months before.

So much is said of the gentleness and long suffering of Christ that we are prone to forget his manly courage. But, in the memory of the scribes and Pharisees, this was his leading characteristic. To the penitent, Jesus was as sunlight; but to the proud hypocrites he was lightning. Behold his sunlight in his beatitudes for the pure-hearted. But do not overlook the sevenfold lightnings of his "Woe unto you, scribes, Pharisees, hypocrites!"

Denneker, the sculptor, said he might have made his great statue of Christ in months instead of years had

HER MOTHER-IN-LAW

Proved a Wise, Good Friend.

A young woman out in Ia. found a wise, good friend in her mother-in-law, jokes notwithstanding. She writes:

"It is two years since we began using Postum in our house. I was greatly troubled with my stomach, complexion was blotchy and yellow. After meals I often suffered sharp pains and would have to lie down. My mother often told me it was the coffee I drank at meals. But when I'd quit coffee I'd have a severe headache.

"While visiting my mother-in-law I remarked that she always made such good coffee, and asked her to tell me how. She laughed and told me it was easy to make good 'coffee' when you use Postum.

"I began to use Postum as soon as I got home, and now we have the same good 'coffee' (Postum) every day, and I have no more trouble. Indigestion is a thing of the past, and my complexion has cleared up beautifully.

"My grandmother suffered a great deal with her stomach. Her doctor told her to leave off coffee. She then took tea but that was just as bad.

"She finally was induced to try Postum, which she has used for over a year. She travelled during the winter over the greater part of Iowa, visiting, something she had not been able to do for years. She says she owes her present good health to Postum."

he not found it so difficult to form a face that would combine the sweetness and fire represented by such opposite utterances. The Christ we picture in our souls is not the true one unless in our conception we have added to faith, valor; unless he is at once the Lamb of God and the Lion of the tribe of Judah.

We can all reflect the courage of Christ, since it was not displayed in the battle of the warrior, nor in the exceptional realm of the adventurer, but in the every-day battles of life. At the very threshold of his ministry, courage led him into forty days of solitude, that he might come back in deepest sympathy with the tempted sons of men.

"The idea of a lean-to religion is somewhat rough, but very suggestive. Weak characters can not stand alone like mansions; but must needs lean on others, like miserable shops which nestle under certain cathedrals." In contrast with that sort of folks is the old couple converted at a meeting, who went home with instruction that they must have family worship. Neither of them could sing or read, and they were untaught in prayer. However, they knelt down, the patriarch swung his hat over his head, and said, "Hurrah for Jesus!" He did his best, and the angels could have done no more. It may seem almost startling in its roughness, but second thought will show its sincerity and heroism.

What serene courage was shown by the priests who went on with the rites of the temple as if there were no assault, when the all-conquering Romans broke into Jerusalem with their troops! A like courage was shown by the Spartan youth who held the censer to Alexander while he offered sacrifice. A coal lighting upon his arm, he suffered it to burn there rather than to disturb the worship by an outcry.

An eminent lawyer, who had been a skeptic until middle life, one evening surprised his wife by saying, "I have found Christ, and I must set up my family altar." His wife was a Christian woman, and might have been expected to assent at once, but the drawing room was occupied by guests, among whom were four lawyers who were not Christians. So she suggested that they have prayers in the kitchen. "My dear," said he, "this is the first time I ever invited Christ to my house, and I am not going to invite him into the kitchen." He went to the drawing room, and said, "My friends, I have just been convinced of the truth of Christianity. I have found out that Jesus Christ died for men on the cross. I have given myself to him, and now I am going to invite him to my house. While I offer my first family prayer, you can remain, if you will. I leave it to your choice." In making the proposition of course the lawyer risked his popularity with his friends. But what did they do? They all declared they would be glad to remain, and did so.

for this philosophy of life. They name it "hedonism." The Bible has a simpler word for it, which, though of similar sound, carries a widely different import; the Bible calls it, not hedonism, but "heathenism"—"for after all these things," says Christ, "do the heathen seek."

The fallacy at the bottom of the whole business is the notion that we can be made permanently glad by getting. Gladsomeness comes by another path. The truly glad are those who have learned how to give, and to give in a whole-hearted fashion, all the living that is theirs.

I read the other day, with much disappointment and with pain, though, I confess, with no very great surprise, the reasons given by the presiding officer of a great labor organization why the workingmen of the country, to so large an extent, were holding themselves aloof from the Christian Church. So far as I could gather, the chief reason seemed to be that the Church did not single out the wage-earner for special attention. Of course, there was the usual disclaimer of any desire for alms, and the usual assertion that justice, and justice only, was the one thing sought. And yet the impression left on my mind was that, in the writer's opinion, the workingmen were waiting outside the Church until they should be better informed as to the inducements which those inside would offer to make their coming in worth their while. There was a look about it all of what is sometimes witnessed near our polling booths on election day.

But perish the Church, say I, before it lets itself be used in any such fashion! The Church is here in the world, a society for the promotion of holiness, a thing which all men need, be they rich or be they poor, be they workers with their hands or workers with their heads, or only stupid idlers. So far as this, her highest duty, is concerned, the Church knows nothing of class distinctions of any sort, and must not know. To all alike the Church says, "Banish from your mind, while within my precincts, the whole question of getting a living. Shut your eyes to the outward tokens of this man's undeserved success, or that man's unearned increment. What does it matter? To his own master he standeth or falleth. That is not the thing we are here for; we are here to learn to give, and the thing, the giving of which God asks from the whole assembly of us, is "all the living that we have." Bishop Ken puts its finely in his morning hymn:

> That all my powers, with all their might,
> In thy sole glory may unite.

Seek we to sing that out in these short lives of ours.

The Little Doctor

A New Serial Story Written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

George Hunter and Dudley Verner were college chums and are stopping at the country home of the former, before George is about to start practice as a lawyer and Dudley as a physician. George is introduced to Miss Danforth, daughter of Squire Danforth, who lives on the fine estate called "Paradise." Dudley is most anxious to meet her. A village character, Jack Green, takes them to see "Paradise." He says that they do not often receive company, but spend much time in travel. They there meet Miss Danforth at the well, and Dudley is introduced. A thunder storm comes up and the young men are invited to take shelter in the house, where they stay to dinner. As they leave, the Squire drives by on the way home. His daughter is surprised at his sudden return. She explains why the young men had been there. He says he is particular about his visitors, and asks her not to do more than recognize them hereafter. He says that he is going abroad, and will take her and her aunt. They go to call on Mrs. Hunter and her niece, Miss Sanborn. The Squire discovers that Mrs. Hunter is an old friend. On his return he tells Aunt Phœbe a family secret, which greatly agitates her, but which she cannot tell Miss Danforth. Marian stays up until early in the morning, when the aunt falls asleep. That day Mr. Hunter and Mr. Verner call to wish them a pleasant voyage. Dudley Verner starts life as a doctor in a quiet neighborhood. The two friends save a little boy named Donald Fraser from being run over, and Dudley takes him home and brings George the next day to see him. Mrs. Fraser faints as George says, "Ellen, is it you?"

"LOVE laughs at locksmiths," said George Hunter, continuing his explanation to Dudley; "and even so love laughed at all the stern commands and restrictions placed upon Captain Fraser and Aunt Ellen by her enraged brother; and through the connivance of some unworthy person, plans were laid for an elopement. These were speedily carried out.

"Not until she had been absent a week, did a letter come telling whither the self-willed girl had gone; and then, her evident carelessness for the sorrow she had caused added to her brother's cup of bitterness, already so nearly full. My father, because of the difference in their ages, had looked upon this sister as a child, and could hardly realize that she was in earnest when she had talked of love and marriage. His health, which had been gradually failing for some years, suddenly gave way; and although Ellen had effectually hidden herself by giving no clue to her place of abode, one of the most urgent requests which he made in regard to the management of his affairs had been that a certain sum of money (as she in her own right had nothing) should be set aside for her use when she should be found."

George, who was a well-grown lad at the time of her marriage, had loved this young aunt devotedly and mourned grievously the loss of his companion.

No effort nor expense was spared to find some trace of her after her brother's death; but although word had been sent to the captain direct, he saw fit to keep his wife in the dark in regard to all home matters.

During the two hours spent together that morning, George had learned from her what her proud nature under happier and more comfortable circumstances would have shrunk from making known. She was weak, and was touched by the sight of the dear face on which years had wrought so little change that she knew it at once. All her reserve was cast aside, and after she had wept at the news of her brother's death, so long kept from her, she revealed a page of her own history. It was dark and painful, and George secretly clenched his hand, as he thought how he should like to deal a blow to the brute who had so embittered the life of his beloved aunt.

"Dudley," he said, "I must take her to my mother. Our home must in future be her home also, and that of her dear boy, whose lameness is due to the temper of that unprincipled ruffian, his father. He is now dead. For Ellen's sake, I must keep my promise not to reveal all his cruelties; but she gave me permission to tell you that Donald's lameness was the result of a blow dealt him when he was a little fellow. She confided this to me, because I begged that she should give you an opportunity to try and cure him. He suffers greatly at times, but I trust that in our comfortable home he will gain enough strength for the operations that will doubtless be necessary, and which I believe you will undertake."

"Gladly, George, for your sake, and for the sake of the poor mother, and most of all for the sake of the child. I shall be very happy if I can be the means of making his life more comfortable."

"Thank you, Dudley; I was sure that you would. Now I must send word to my mother. I am sure the child, who will be such an interest to mother, will do her good also."

The message was sent as soon as they could drive to the telegraph office. Then they returned to the park, Dudley believing that the open air would be the best medicine for his friend's over-strained nerves. Impatient for an answer to his telegram, he called at the office on his return and took it from the hands of the operator, who was just looking up his address.

Opening it hastily, he read:

"Bring her home at once. I am so happy. YOUR MOTHER."

Turning to Dudley, he said, "She will be happier still when she sees that dear boy. Come with me for dinner to-night, Dudley; I am in no mood to dine alone, neither am I in a mood to talk to my law partner."

After dinner they went out for a walk. They passed a hall where a religious meeting was being held, and Dudley, upon hearing the sound of the organ, proposed that they should go in. Just as they took their seats, a sweet clear voice was heard, and although, from the first to the last line of the sacred song, every heart was thrilled, George heard nothing more after the words:

Where is my wandering boy to-night,
The boy of my tenderest care;
The boy that was once my joy and light,
The child of my love and prayer?

He sat as in a dream—a dream of the past. He thought of his father's love and care; of his mother's devotion to the young girl who was more like a dear daughter to them than a sister; of the years of waiting and longing for her return; and of the happy ending and the glad meeting in store for his mother and Ellen.

He went to his friend's office at the close of the services and they set an hour to go together on the morrow to Mrs. Fraser's. As he said "Good night," Dudley called after him, "You will have pleasant dreams to-night, George."

At the appointed hour next day, they started, George chatting all the way about his mother and Lily, Ellen and Donald, and arranging plans for the future. He was surely to take Dudley out to Branksome with him as often as possible, to do what he could for little Donald.

As they ascended the stairway to the humble home, George smiled as he thought how soon Ellen and her boy would be in a dwelling of comfort and luxury.

He tapped at the door, once, twice, thrice—and was not admitted; then, with a strange foreboding of evil, he entered, followed by Dudley. There was nobody in the room, but the plain furniture was all in place, and on the mantelpiece he noticed a letter, placed evidently so as to attract attention, addressed to "George Hunter, Esq."

Hearing the sound of footsteps, a woman who occupied a room on the same landing entered, saying, "Are you the gentlemen who were to come to see Mrs. Fraser to-day?"

With a troubled face, George replied, "Yes."

"Well, I promised to leave the room open till you came and got your letter."

This was said with an air that meant, "And now I'll lock the door, if you will go out."

Dudley uttered not a word until they had both quitted the room and gone down to the carriage.

Then he said, "Be brave, George; we have many disappointments in life."

Hastily tearing open the letter, he read:

"MY DEAR GEORGE:

"Do not think me ungrateful in not waiting to see you. Poor Donald was so impatient for the morrow which would bring you.

"I thought I was a widow until to-day. After you left, I saw something in a paper that had been wrapped about some work, that determined me to leave. I have given my furniture to the landlady to clear my rent and leave a little for our immediate necessities.

"I do not know your address. God bless you. I trust we shall meet again. I dare not linger. Love to all.

"ELLEN."

OLD AT TWENTY

Return of Youth with Proper Food.

Many persons who eat plenty never seem to be properly nourished.

That's because the food is not digested and absorbed. Much that is eaten is never taken up by the system as real food, and so the tissues simply starve and the individual may, as in a recent case, look and feel old in what should be the bloom of life, youth.

"At twenty I was prematurely old. All the health and vigor and brightness of youth had been, as it seemed, stolen from me. I went to work in the morning with slow steps and a dull head.

"My work through the day was unsatisfactory, for my breakfast lay in my stomach like a hard lump. I was peevish and the gas in my stomach was very annoying. After supper I usually went to bed to toss half the night from sheer nervousness.

"This was all from indigestion—wrong eating.

"Finally I tried Grape-Nuts and I cannot describe the full benefits received from the food. It gave me back my health. It has completely restored good digestion and relieved me of my ailments. I steadily improved and am now strong and in perfect health."

CHAPTER IX

AGAIN Ellen was completely lost to the loved ones who would so gladly have given to her and her child the shelter of their love, and poured at her feet so many blessings.

George was completely overcome by his disappointment, and the possibility that his aunt and her child had gone to a life of suffering; but his friend hurried him to the privacy of his own office and sought by every argument in his power to lead him to take a hopeful view of the case.

He would have gone at once to his mother with the story of his trouble; but Dudley overruled him in this, getting him at last to send a telegram to her saying that circumstances would prevent him from going home with Ellen at present and that their visit was indefinitely postponed.

A long letter came in answer to this, in which his mother poured out her grief-stricken heart to her son and told him what a blessing his life was to her. She enclosed a note to Dudley in which she spoke of the friendship existing between him and her son and compared them to David and Jonathan.

She then said: "George tells me of your self-sacrificing devotion to your fellow-men, and I pray God that his richest blessings may rest upon you in your work.

"To use the words of a favorite author, 'Nothing so nearly approaches my ideal of the Perfect Man as he went about doing good, as the life of a physician,' and I have often thought that, had I been a man, nothing would have satisfied my longing for work in the world like the practice of medicine.

"You have no mother, George tells me. Will you take me for a second mother, and consider my house your home?"

Dudley's reply was characteristic of his warm and loving temperament. He spoke of his love for his work and of some of his early experiences which had led him to the choice of his profession. He poured out his heart in gratitude for the loving kindness which had prompted her to offer him her home and the shelter of a mother's love. He concluded by saying:

"How rich I feel that I have at last a mother! I shall, ere long, bring my adopted brother for a visit to you. He is over-taxing himself. Until then, I am your loving son, DUDLEY."

George came into Dudley's office one evening, saying, "Mother has sent me a letter from Miss Danforth that she thought would interest both of us. Her letters are meant for each member of the family, and, as you are now one of us, you must share it."

"Thank you, and thank our mother for her kind consideration. Read it, George."

George read aloud:

"EDINBURGH, July 28, 18—.

"MY DEAR FRIENDS:

"Summer is drawing to a close. It is lovely weather here, and but for the dear friends left at home in America, my father and I would gladly pitch our tents here indefinitely. Aunt Phœbe is not one with us in this, and even the dreaded ocean voyage has no power to keep her from her own country.

"Taking the tramways, as they are called here, one day, we went to Morningside, a suburb of Edinburgh, and were shown through the asylum for the insane. It is perfect in its management and everything possible is done for the comfort of the unfortunate inmates. In some of them no one would imagine reason to be dethroned, while others had a wild, frightened look, as though they were constantly being pursued.

"My father found some one he knew there and says there was surely a special providence which impelled him to visit this institution. His friend there has lucid intervals, and is more like one whose brain has been dazed by some great sorrow, or like a fever patient, than like a demented person.

"He has received some useful information, we understand, which may serve to lift a cloud from his whole future life.

"This season of travel is giving me a renewed interest in history, and I trust my father will extend our journey, after we have finished the principal cities of Scotland, to England and Ireland. I shall never be able to thank him enough for having directed my reading in such a way as to interest me in the history of my own and other lands.

"How are Dr. Verner and Mr. Hunter succeeding in their chosen professions? I have no desire to find fault with my lot, but at times I feel that if I only were a man I could do much more than now to ameliorate the condition of those in distress.

"Aunt Phœbe is calling, 'Are you going to write all day, Marian?' so I must close my letter and hasten to see what she has on hand for me to do. Most likely an hour of shopping. She is picking up here and there more pieces of silk, and more laces, and articles of bric-a-brac (all bargains, she assures me), than I believe she will ever use.

"With love and best wishes, etc."

As George folded up the letter, Dudley said, "Had I been blessed with a sister like that, how I should have enjoyed visiting with her the many places of which she writes and of which I have often read! And yet she wishes she were a man."

"I am very glad that she is not a man," said George—then blushed like a girl at what he had said.

"You need not hesitate to show your feelings to me, George. I do not blame you in the least. She is a lovely girl; and, while I have a presentiment that I should never find favor as her lover, either in her eyes or those of the Squire, I think she is worthy to be wooed and won by such a man as you, and I wish you godspeed."

After sitting lost in thought for a time, George said, "I want you to go home with me to-morrow, Dudley. You will help me to make the disappointment about Ellen fall less heavily upon mother, and I want you to see mother as a physician. I am anxious about her frail health, and you know I have great faith in your skill."

"I shall be ready," he replied, "and, George, don't you think you ought to advertise, in a guarded way, for Mrs. Fraser?"

"Yes, if it can be done."

India's Heroes*

IT USED to be said that such was John Wesley's wonderful power of expression that his mere utterance of a word like "Mesopotamia" could bathe a whole audience in tears.

This is doubtless an exaggeration of even the great eloquence of a great preacher; but it is certain that no one can pronounce the word "India" without bringing up in the mind of every intelligent hearer a wonderful and captivating vision. The work of historians, travelers and missionaries in this direction has of late years been reinforced by the tales and poems of some of our best writers. Now we think of India not only as the land of the Mahabarata and the Vedas, of Buddha, of Brahma, of gems and gold, of lofty mountains and wonderful rivers, of famine, sensuality and war, of bells and temples and palm trees, but as the scene of emotions and experiences such as come to ourselves. India has been made not so much romantic as real to us during this last half century. We understand better the climate, the race characteristics, the mode of life of those strange, passionate peoples, for whose salvation so many noble Christian lives have been sacrificed, and among whom the first Protestant missions were established.

All our missionaries bear testimony to the bewildering extremes in India —the luxury of the wealthy and the horrible condition of the poor; the culture and learning of the high-caste Brahman and the dense ignorance and superstition of the "outcaste" or pariah. The distinctions of society in India would seem to correspond with those of the earth itself, for nowhere are the hills so high and the valleys so deep.

The wisdom of Carey, at the mention of whose name it would seem as though every Christian ought almost to bow his head, was shown in his careful study of the situation before beginning aggressive measures. Many and many a cause has been lost by premature activity in it.

After acquiring the language, he began to translate the Bible into Bengali. The secret of success in every mission field has been the quick introduction of the Bible, in words which the people could read. The Bible is the sword by which God conquers. It is said that no country is better supplied with versions of the Bible in the various vernaculars than is India. Through the efforts of Dr. John Murdock and his helpers, a large supply of Christian periodicals has been issued also, for the men of the higher castes all read.

One of the most striking tributes to the work of Christian missionaries in India is the testimony on all sides that the ancient native faiths, while not often acknowledging the fact, are becoming greatly modified and purified, in evident deference to Christianity. The keen and thoughtful, and often high-minded, Hindus, Moslems, Buddhists and Parsees detect the superiority of Christian ethics to the less spiritual and often bestial ceremonies and customs of their own religions, and hasten to introduce certain of its features, as though original with themselves.

The Salvation Army is said to have had less success than other sects in India, though one would think that it might have more. Cheddy Lal, a prominent high-caste Brahman, says: "The other missionaries are liked better. These do not come in a carriage, as Europeans should. They dress as we do. They are thought to be poor, and they are despised." Such are the peculiar standards of many East Indians.

For Love's Sake*

THE first great work of our missionaries everywhere has been to show their people that they love them. The first and best argument for the medical missionary, to whom the great world movement is so heavily indebted, is that, through the healing of their sick, love is most readily enkindled in any family or community.

"The missionary," says Dr. Bliss, "must be able to do, in a measure, what the Master did when he suffered the woman that was a sinner to wash his feet. . . . The years spent in unremitting study by Judson, Morrison, Riggs, Van Dyck and Bridgeman; the pains taken by Vanderkemp, Moffat, Paton, Grant, to enter into the circumstances of Hottentots, South Sea Islanders, and Nestorians, show that the most successful missionary is the man who can enter most fully into the life of the people."

This idea of fellowship was grasped early in the history of missions; but one great obstacle loomed up in the path of the devoted men who formed the vanguard in this mighty movement. It was the women of heathendom, uniformly ignorant and degraded—everywhere drudges, with no hope either for this life or the life to come, and inaccessible to the male missionary.

Thus came the introduction of the woman missionary, the almost miraculous zenana work, the women's colleges in many of the great cities of the pagan empires, and the entrance of pure, high-minded womanhood into the harems of the East.

It is said that no single college has achieved so remarkable a victory over national prejudice and ecclesiastical hostility as the American Institute for Girls at Madrid, founded by Mrs. Alice Gordon Gulick. When one remembers that, broadly speaking, few women can read in Spain, and only a small percentage of the men, it can be realized that the idea of educating girls would be met there with scorn and ridicule. The beautiful character and keen mind of Mrs. Gulick disarmed hostility. The loss was irreparable when she died, though her successors are following nobly in her footsteps.

It has been thus in every land into which our noble women missionaries have penetrated—Fidelia Fiske, the Judsons, Mrs. Snow, Mrs. Lawes, and scores of others equally devoted. All honor to them!

The history of heathen nations can be cited, almost without exception, to prove the futility of their religions; for a religion which does not make men stronger, truer, purer, more faithful to duty, more mindful of obligations, is no proper faith.

"Thus," says Mr. Zwemer, for sixteen years a missionary in Arabia, "Islam has been for 500 years supreme in Turkey, the fairest and richest portion of the Old World. And what is the result? The Mohammedan population has decreased; the treasury is bankrupt; progress is blocked; everywhere poverty, rags, beggary—a failure greater and more absolute than history can elsewhere present."

But is Mohammedanism so much less successful than other Oriental religions? Of the native religion of India, Dr. Bliss says: "Not greater is the contrast between the eternal snows of the Himalayas and the reeking jungles, than that between the spirit and teaching of the early Vedas and the modern filth of the Hindu worship. . . . The worst debauchery of the land finds its support in the highest caste." "By their fruits shall ye know them."

Holeproof Sox—Now 25c A Pair

The price of famous Holeproof Sox—the original sox guaranteed six months—is now $1.50 for a box of 6 pairs, instead of $2, as formerly.

So those who don't want to pay more than 25c a pair for sox, can now have the best sox made at that price.

For, although the price has been reduced, the quality is exactly the same as when the price was 50c more.

The reason is this—

The Best Yarn Now Costs Us 10c Per Lb. Less Than Before.

So we are able to cut the price without touching the quality.

We now pay an average of 63c per lb. for the best Egyptian and Sea Island cotton yarn, instead of 73c.

We could buy coarse yarn for less than half what we pay. But the sox would lack the superior quality that has made them the best.

Are Your Hose Insured?

The Lights of New York

VISITORS to New York City miss one of the most beautiful sights of the metropolis if they do not stroll down lower Broadway, from the City Hall to the Battery, just at the edge of evening in winter. No artist could conceive in his wildest flight of fancy a more fairy-like scene than appears the moment the lights in the great office buildings are turned on. These great structures tower up on either hand into the blue-black of the night sky, making the street appear like the bed of an enormous ravine, whose sides are set with innumerable lights. These "thousand eyes of night" twinkle from story to story until the passerby is dizzy as he gazes upward, lost in wonder at the beautiful picture which has been made in a few moments from the prosaic brick and stone of the skyscrapers and the magic electric lights.

Our cover this week was painted from the actual scene, the point of view being from the left side of Broadway just above old St. Paul's Church, which is shown at the right. St. Paul's is New York's most historic church. There Washington attended service a hundred years before skyscraping buildings were ever thought of, and there gallant Montgomery, who fell, sword in hand, before Quebec, rests quietly, unheeding the bustle of the wonderful city which has grown up from the little town he knew. Further along the buildings rise higher and yet higher, until they are overtopped by the tower-like Singer building, whose peak pierces the upper air six hundred feet above the street. The Singer building remains lit far into the night, and its white appearance, in the gray dusk of the evening, comes from the fact that a searchlight from a roof below is turned upon it so that it may be distinguished from points many miles inland. It seems a magic structure, red and gold and white in the light's rays, and those who have seen it every night since it was built have not tired of the sight.

Between five and six, the offices close, one by one, and pour their multitudes into the street. Broadway for a time is blocked with a stream of moving humanity, which sends smaller streams off westward to take the ferries to New Jersey, eastward to Brooklyn and down into the subways to go northward to the Bronx. Gradually the lights go out in the office buildings, story by story, street by street, until only here and there one small sparkle is left, while over all rises the magic Singer tower, a vision such as is conjured by rubbing Aladdin's Lamp.

sands of Messina and Reggio. The relief steamship Bayern carries $30,000 worth of food and medicine in their name to the Calabrian coast villages. But those are simply a few drops in the great ocean of immediate need. We urge every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to send in with all haste his or her gift to help in this life-saving campaign. To be effective, it must be done quickly. Thousands are perishing, and plague is now adding to the horrors of the situation. Relief sent NOW will save many a precious life which a day's delay may sacrifice.

Everybody can and should do something. Churches, Sunday Schools, Christian Endeavor and Epworth League Circles should act at once, in order to be represented in this urgent benevolence. It is easily within the reach of every one to save one precious life, if no more. Will you save that life? It may be a man, a woman or a little helpless child, but its rescue will be your work.

This is the duty that lies before all who read this pitiful story of human suffering—to reach forth a helping hand and lift up one poor fellow creature from despair and death into life and hope. So will the blessing that comes to those who answer the call of the stricken, the widows and the fatherless be yours, for Christ himself hath said "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me."

What Will You Give To Be Well

I CANNOT tell you how happy I am that I have been able to bring health and strength to 30,000 women in the past six years. Just think! this means a whole city. It is to my thorough study of anatomy, physiology and health principles, and to my 12 years' personal experience before I began my instructions by mail, that I attribute my marvelous success. It would do your heart good to read the reports from my pupils—and I have done all this by simply studying Nature's laws adapted to the correction of each individual difficulty. If vital organs or nerve centers are weak, I strengthen them so that each organ does its work.

To Have Good Figure, Vibrant Health, Rested Nerves?

I want to help every woman to be perfectly, gloriously well, with that sweet, personal loveliness which health and a wholesome, graceful body gives—a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose, full of the health and vivacity which makes you

A Better Wife
A Rested Mother
A Sweeter Sweetheart

You can easily remove the fat and it will stay removed. I have reduced 15,000 women.

Too Fleshy?

One pupil writes me:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I feel so well I want to shout! I never get out of breath now.

"When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy. I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Too Thin?

I may need to strengthen your stomach, intestines and nerves first. A pupil who was thin, writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman."

"My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

I bring each pupil to symmetrical proportions and I teach her to stand and to walk in an attitude which bespeaks culture and refinement. A good figure, gracefully carried, means more than a pretty face. Nature's rosy cheeks are more beautiful than paint or powder. I help you to

Arise to Your Best!

The day for drugging the system has passed. In the privacy of your own room, I strengthen the muscles and nerves of the vital organs, lungs and heart and start your blood to circulating as it did when you were a child. I teach you to breathe so that the blood is fully purified.

You Can Be Well Without Drugs

And the vital strength gained by a forceful circulation relieves you of such chronic ailments as

Constipation Dullness
Torpid Liver Irritability
Indigestion Nervousness
Rheumatism Sleeplessness
Weaknesses Weak Nerves
Catarrh

by strengthening whatever organs or nerves are weak.

I wish I could put sufficient emphasis into these words to make you realize that you do not need to be ill, but that you can be a buoyant, vivacious, attractive woman in return for just a few minutes' care each day in your own home.

Individual Instruction—I give each pupil the individual, confidential treatment which her case demands. My information and advice are entirely free.

A CORSET IS NOT NEEDED FOR A GOOD FIGURE

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you. I never treat a patient I cannot help. If I cannot help you I will refer you to the help you need.

Send me 10 cents for instructive booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly.

We have discovered the ideal laundry soap, after years of costly experiments. It is a pure, white soap, possessing almost magical dirt-starting qualities. It will save rubbing, wear and tear on clothes, and the regulation Monday backache.

Sunny Monday Soap *(N.R.) will wash your finest fabrics, particularly woolens, without shrinking; it will brighten goods rather than fade them; it can be used with equal success in any kind of water.

Sunny Monday Soap *(N.R.) is kind to hands as well as to clothes, and its use means less labor, less expense and better results.

THE FORTY-SEVENTH STAR IN THE FLAG

SINCE President Roosevelt and President-elect Taft, with the party leaders in House and Senate, have pledged themselves to Statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, it seems to be a reasonable certainty that the two Southwestern Territories will be granted the boon of Statehood before the close of 1909. In the case of New Mexico, this will be but justice, which already has been too long deferred. Arizona, too, is doubtless better equipped for Statehood than were many other Territories at the time of their admission, but its growth has been more recent.

New Mexico covers an area of 122,469 square miles—being larger than any State in the Union, excepting Texas, California and Montana. Of this vast area, amounting to 78,380,000 acres, in 1900 there were less than 250,000 acres under cultivation. In 1908, there were not less than 2,500,000 acres included in cultivated farms. The irrigation works now under construction will cost more than $10,000,000, and will add 500,000 acres more to the cultivated area. Of the 40,000,000 acres of vacant public domain included in the Territory, it is estimated that at least 13,000,000 acres can be farmed by the so-called "dry farming" methods that have already been applied with notable success in the Estancia Valley. Although located entirely in the semi-arid region, and regarded as a desert territory, New Mexico has within its boundaries more than 8,000,000 acres of timber lands—an area three times that of Connecticut—and 7,000,000 acres of forest reserves.

The discovery that vast areas of the Southwest, heretofore regarded as useful only for grazing, may be farmed with profit has led to a remarkable influx of settlers. Within the past two years, more than 45,000 homeseekers, with their families, have located in New Mexico alone, adding approximately 200,000 to the population. According to the census of 1900, the population was only 195,000. Governor George Curry now estimates it at 500,000. The census of 1910 will show it to have a greater population than that of either Delaware, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Utah, Vermont or Wyoming, and to be closely crowding Florida, South Dakota and other States.

It is said that more new post-offices were established in New Mexico during 1908 than in any State or any other Territory in the Union. It has 125 newspapers, 70 banks, a university, an agricultural college, military school, two normal schools, a School of Mines, blind asylum, deaf and dumb asylum, miners' hospital, reform school, asylum for the insane, and hospitals and orphans' schools, all supported by the Territory. The commonwealth spends $1,000,000 a year, or one-half its income from taxes, for educational purposes, amounting to approximately $20 for each child of school age. Altogether the Spanish-speaking portion of the population numbers less than 100,000. Of these, less than 40,000 speak Spanish exclusively.

It is along lines of agricultural development that New Mexico is destined to make its greatest contributions to the wealth of the nation. One of the largest irrigation enterprises yet undertaken by the Government Reclamation Service is situated in the Pecos Valley, and will ultimately reclaim 20,000 square miles. Another important government irrigation project is the Elephant Buttes project, for the reclamation of 180,000 acres, now under way. Numerous other enterprises of like character are rapidly increasing the area of land to which intensive farming methods may be applied. The chief agricultural products are hay and forage crops, corn, wheat, vegetables, orchard products, oats, beans, potatoes, peas, sugar beets, barley and sweet potatoes. There are upon the stock ranges not less than 5,500,000 sheep, 1,000,000 cattle, 200,000 goats, and 200,000 horses, mules and donkeys. From 20,000,000 to 25,000,000 pounds of wool, and from 2,000,000 to 2,500,000 lambs are sold from the ranges annually. New Mexico ranks as the oldest mining district in the United States, but its annual production of the precious metals now barely exceeds $500,000. There is reason to suppose that systematic development will prove it to be as rich in gold and silver as its immediate neighbors. It produces 10,000,000 pounds of copper, 4,000,000 pounds of lead and a million dollars' worth of zinc annually.

A Mining Camp in the Copper Hills of Arizona

However, the most important mineral resource of the Territory is coal. About two and a half million tons of coal and 300,000 tons of coke are produced annually. There are at least 8,534,000 acres of coal land, estimated to contain nearly one hundred and sixty-four billion tons of coal in workable seams. Most of this is yet included in the public domain. Although the Territory now has 3,000 miles of railroad, its most pressing need is for increased transportation facilities. The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé system has a mileage of 1,300 miles in New Mexico. The El Paso and Southwestern Railroad has 650 miles of track, the Denver and Rio Grande 300 miles; the Santa Fé Central, 120 miles completed and 60 under construction. There still remain immense stretches of country without transportation facilities.

The people of New Mexico regard the climate as one of the greatest assets of the Territory. The altitude

The Abundant Life

TEXT—John 10 : 10
"I am come that they may have life and may have it abundantly."

THERE is a vital thrill and a spacious, splendid generosity in the words which make them peculiarly precious and peculiarly characteristic. The word "life" is a notable one in John's writings. It summarizes his conception of Christ's mission and is a synonym for salvation. "In Him was life; and the life was the light of men." "I am the bread of life." "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." "I am the resurrection and the life." "This is life eternal, that they may know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." "These things are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Son of God, and that, believing, ye may have life in his name." So, too, in John's Epistles the same word is prominent. "He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." And in the Apocalypse there are the "crown of life," "the river of life" and the "water of life" in inexhaustible quantities for all who are thirsty.

What the Message Means

The first natural inference is that the life is Christ's special provision, not to be had apart from him. He is the holder and distributor of life abundant and eternal. It is not a function which he exercises in common with others. It is his alone. He is contrasting himself in these verses with others who assume the leadership of men, in which contrasts they appear as dangerous and he as gracious. Others come to steal, kill, destroy; he comes to make alive. But if we study the message closely and the figures used in it, we will find that he is not merely superior in his ministry, but also solitary. He is the door without whom the sheep cannot find their way into the shelter and fellowship of the fold. He is the Shepherd, without whom they can have neither guidance nor pasture. So, too, he has come that men may have life that is life indeed—life spiritual, blessed, bountiful, divine—and this glorious life is not to be had apart from him. That is a sweeping and astounding claim, but it constitutes a Gospel. To deny the claim is to destroy the Gospel. When men explain the recorded and significant facts of this mighty life so as to cause the facts to disappear; when his coming is regarded not as a deliberate incarnation, with a gift of mercy for men; his ministry not as the movement of the accredited representative of God, but as the enthusiasm of a simple, devoted man; his death not as a chosen sacrifice for the salvation of men, but as murder or martyrdom; his resurrection not as veritable history, but as the fancy of excited disciples, who were sure that such a leader could not die—when men thus treat the record and reduce the old verities to vapor, and then go on to say that nevertheless Jesus is a good rallying centre for the religious emotions of men, an ideal not to be deserted by people who have any moral ambitions, a good concrete expression of the rules of virtue, we must cherish his name and story because he is influential in the social life of the world, he is useful to many a life even though not absolutely necessary to any life—when we hear such things we are not listening to a Gospel, but to the ghost of a Gospel.

The Mission of Jesus

The real Gospel is "I am come"—from another sphere, from glory older and greater than the glory of the world, from a fellowship of privilege and prerogative with the Almighty Father, not merely throwing off royal trappings, not merely turning my back upon material splendors, but emptying my life of its unlimited power and knowledge, cramping it, reducing it, forcing it within mortal limits, accepting with love's passionate gladness all the pains involved in the journey, in order that through me—God's fellow and man's lover—sick, decrepit, dying souls might have life pure, radiant, abounding, eternal, divine! That's the Gospel announced. And the story of the flawless life, the perfect teaching, the unselfish ministry, the death which was love's triumph, the resurrection which was the climax, the endorsement, the guarantee of all power—that story is the assurance that the programme is carried out. It is not a case of promise without performance. The good news is authentic. The life described and offered is available for all the sons of men. Jesus is not only the illustration of the life, but its mediator and giver forever.

And then the generosity of his temper is impressive. There is nothing scanty in the measure he plans for his gift. The life he offers does not exist in a certain definite bounded quantity, to be divided and subdivided with exact care so that there may be enough to go around, distributed economically lest some day there be an embarrassing shortage. It is not on that scale that the giving of God in the realms of grace is conducted. God is never niggardly. Generosity is characteristic of all his movements. He who "throws up the golden spray of multitudinous worlds," reproduces living forms in innumerable millions of specimens, gives increase "an hundred fold" to the grain kernels we commit to the fertile earth, makes treasuries of the iron hills for the storage of the valuable minerals, might be expected to plan in a large way for the spiritual life of men.

"I am come not to destroy, but to fulfil," which last word means "fill full," might be adopted as the phrase which unlocks the purpose of the Son of man in regard to those he came to save. Yet often he has been caricatured and presented as having a destructive programme. Men have talked as though he came to destroy wealth, or at least to prevent man's possession of it, as though poverty were the only condition he could endorse. They have denied that he had any sympathy with art beauty and have destroyed the creations of chisel and brush, as though the artistic impulse were sinful. They have denied the value of wide knowledge and put their interdict, in Christ's name, upon intellectual activity. But this kind of interpretation, of which we have too many specimens in Christian history, is a denial of Christ's whole spirit and policy. Neither poverty, nor ignorance, nor ugliness, are Christian virtues. He was poor, but his poverty was a part of the limitation he endured at the bidding of love.

Three Mighty Forces

He had rich friends. He did, to be sure, tell one eager soul, who was in the grip of greed, to sell all that he had and give to the poor, but he did not tell all his wealthy lovers to do that; not the nobleman who believed in him, nor the centurion who built a synagogue, nor Lazarus, nor Joseph of Arimathea, whose mausoleum sheltered his broken body. And we may be just as sure that he had no wish to take the perception or the love of beauty out of man's soul or the expression of it out of man's life. He who saw the beautiful things hidden away in the secret life of Nathanael and in the woman who was content to be called a dog if she could only get some crumbs of blessing for her sick child, and in Mary of Bethany and the centurion of Capernaum—he assuredly was never blind to material beauty; and not only the fragile lilies of the field and the architectural splendors of the temple, but all things beautiful, brought light to his eye and response from his soul.

The fact is, he came to destroy nothing but sin. Enlargement, not reduction, is his policy. Not miserly, but royal, is his spirit. There is no caution in his temper in this matter. Limitations are flung to the winds. "I am come that they may have life abundantly." Not life enough to keep a soul from extinction, but a life surplus larger than the original capital. Take the abounding life of our modern Western world, in all its worthy, splendid expressions; how much of it is the gift of Jesus? All of it, say some careful historical students. A Scotch writer declares that the three great forces which have made Western civilization are the Incarnation, the Crucifixion and the Resurrection of Christ. There is no explanation of our abundant life more logical than that and none so plausible. And what Jesus is doing historically for the race he is eager to do for every soul. Starved, dwarfed, emaciated, anæmic souls are not according to his plan. Overflowing life is his wish. Not restraint, but unlimited growth. This life is spiritual in its beginning and essence. It is the spiritual capacity in us which is our most splendid human characteristic. No man, no matter what his body may be or his mind or his social graces or his moral ideals, can be allowed place in the highest class of the race if he is without spiritual sensitiveness. No man can be dead at the top and still be taken as a specimen of complete life. To put men into conscious, saving, quickening touch with God—that is our Lord's first and chief business.

But we must not separate this life of the spirit from life in its other phases. You cannot conceive of spiritual life apart from its intellectual and social and moral expressions. No man can be spiritually alive without thought and feeling. And the expansions of thought and feeling are involved in the growth of the spiritual life. We are to increase in truth and power and purity and faith and love until we come at last to the "measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ," where the life's pulses are never feeble and life's overflow is forever guaranteed.

A Gift for All Who Accept

A surplus supply is always our ambition. Physical life in sufficient measure to keep us from death is not attractive to us if we are normal. Rather abounding life, robust health, overflowing energy, which makes toil a pastime and mere breathing a pleasure; life in such measure as makes one say,

> How good is man's life, the mere living! how fit to employ
> All the heart and the soul and the senses forever in joy!

Overflowing physical life we covet. So, too, in financial life. We are not content with money enough to keep us from the poorhouse. We want at least enough to keep us from anxiety about the supply of life's needs. Enough of a surplus to enable us to think of other things beside hunger and cold—that is a modest ambition. And in intellectual life, sufficient information and mental training to save us from the suspicion of imbecility is not what we covet. Some slight intellectual surplus we count necessary to the comfort and zest of living. Likewise, in the life of the Spirit we are not called upon to be content with just enough life to save us from spiritual extinction. Yet, alas! how often it is true that souls care for nothing more! Religious forms out of which heart has gone, religious beliefs out of which vital meaning has dropped, religious hopes which have lost all power to thrill, a bit of ancient experience which has become a dim memory, a habit of prayer or of church attendance which has become mechanical—these represent the scanty life of multitudes of the professed followers of Jesus Christ. Yet he came that we might have life which is bubbling, overflowing, jubilant.

It is not for a select few. It is for all souls who trust him. Circumstances have nothing to do with it. "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." Things have no necessary relation to it. Francis of Assisi was poor, John Bunyan was a prisoner, and they were both spiritually glorious. Moncure D. Conway tells of meeting Becky, a poor colored woman, who had traits unlike those of any white person he had ever met. She was not socially illustrious. By his standards she was theologically queer. But she was spiritually fascinating. Poverty doesn't prevent the life. And neither does wealth. Lady Huntington, Count Zinzendorf, Lord Shaftesbury and many another wealthy spiritual athlete prove that life's supreme heights are always accessible to those whose feet may sometimes be entangled by the flowers of its lower levels.

The Symmetry of Jesus' Own Life

Jesus himself is the illustration of the life he longs to give. His life is not more notable for its purity than for its symmetry and balance. Yet those terms, all of them true and all of them necessary, do not describe him. There was in him this abundance of which he speaks, life in the surplus, a jubilant radiance of life which thrilled men and made them wonder at his words and at his work, which made sufferers believe that if they could but touch his clothes they should be healed. No note in life is more emphatic evidence of its fulness than joy. He was joyous. Peace and joy are his bequests to his disciples. The quietness of his life and the gleam, the glory, the laughter of it he ordains that his lovers shall have. Some one reminds us that joy in anything is a sign of ownership. We really possess only what we enjoy. Judged by that test, he owned everything—the flowers and the clouds, the dawns and the sunsets, the

LEADERS IN THE WOMEN'S CAMPAIGN

Miss Emilie Rathou, Sweden

Countess Fanny Salazas, Italy

Mrs. Philip Snowden, London

Miss Ada Henry, Australia

Baroness Von Hansen, Germany

THE outlook for the progress of woman suffrage in 1909 is a promising one. In all parts of the world there is an awakening. Woman's enfranchisement is already an accomplished fact on one-fifteenth of the world's surface. Heretofore, the campaign has been in countries of large territory and small population. The coming endeavors, it is predicted, will be conducted in countries of small territory and large population.

Dr. Katthe Schirmacher, France

It should encourage American women to know that 1908 saw the investment with the full franchise of 300,000 women in Norway, who (like the women in Finland) are now eligible for Parliament. This new citizen class consists of single women who pay taxes for an income of 400 kroner in cities and 300 in the country, and of married women whose husbands pay similar taxes. About 200,000 women are yet excluded from the franchise, however, by the property qualification, which does not apply to men. Thus the new women voters of Norway have work before them in securing the release from this disability of their poorer sisters. "Universal suffrage for women the same as for men" is their campaign motto for 1909.

The tax-paying women in Denmark have made a great forward step during 1908 in the gain of the municipal suffrage on the same conditions as men, and they may now vote for all officers, except members of Parliament. New Danish women's organizations have sprung up and affiliated with the older bodies. Among them is a society of Christian women banded together to secure and promote women's political equality on a plane with that of men. The women in Sweden, who already had municipal suffrage, have recently been made eligible to municipal offices, and will consequently be active factors in civic affairs in future. Thus the Scandinavians have set the pace in woman's advancement for the world to follow.

In Finland, where a pastor's wife, a school teacher, a textile worker, the president of the Servants' Union, a farmer's wife and a school principal sit side by side among the nineteen women members of Parliament, the women are potently using their ballot. The furtherance of the civil rights of women, the protection of childhood and the promotion of moral reforms are on their calendar.

The restrained activity which has marked the woman suffrage movement in Russia is expected to increase and expand. Women of property have been given the proxy vote in the election of the Duma. A commission of the Russian Union for Woman's Rights has been organized in St. Petersburg for the purpose of advancing women's rights in the proceedings of the Duma. The first Woman's Congress ever held in Russia (convened in 1908, under the auspices of the "Russian Woman's Society of Mutual Help") was largely the work of the suffragists.

The National Congress of the Progressive League of Germany, in its recent session, declared for the admission of women to political representation in the empire, the state and the municipality. The new German Woman Suffrage Association consists now of a union of all the independent national (or state) associations—Baden, Wurtemberg, Hessen, Prussia, Saxony, Bremen and Hamburg being the principal ones. By petition, agitation and education, the German woman suffragists are carrying on an active campaign.

Austrian women, who were deprived of the property suffrage in 1906, when men were given universal suffrage, are entering upon a vigorous campaign. In Prague, where a new electoral law is being prepared, the women are earnestly seeking recognition. Italy has a strong suffrage organization. The woman movement has been advanced in Greece, where the Queen interested herself in forming the National Council of Women, and serves as president. In Holland, the woman's suffrage reform received a powerful impetus during 1908, through the special (the second) executive meeting of the International Suffrage Alliance at Amsterdam, in which several hundred delegates from a score of countries took active part. The immediate result was the organization of a Men's League, pledged to vote for no candidate for Parliament who does not emphatically favor the enfranchisement of women.

Mme. Calirrhoe Parren, Greece

Great Britain is expected to continue as the storm centre until the question of woman suffrage is settled. British women voters have received recent recognition by eligibility as mayors, county, borough and town councilors. They desire full parliamentary suffrage.

Even in South Africa women are hopefully planning for recognition in the proposed new Federation. The plan includes the education of women to understand the meaning and the need of suffrage.

Apropos of the Russian Women's Congress it should be recorded that "social reform," rather than the suffrage, was its prime object. Some of the speeches were marked by attacks on the marriage system, which were hardly calculated to help the cause of suffrage.

A NEW OPPORTUNITY FOR BOYS AND GIRLS

THOUSANDS of wide-awake boys and girls in CHRISTIAN HERALD families will hail with delight the splendid new proposition that is open to those who are ambitious and energetic. We now offer to supply "spending money" and many different premiums besides to boys and girls all over this country. We desire to engage as our agent a boy or girl in every town and city to sell copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at 5 cents each, to people who are not subscribers at the present time. The purpose of the will be twofold. First, to encourage habits of industry and perseverance in the younger generation; secondly, to secure for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD new readers, who will be helped and strengthened by a weekly perusal of its pages.

No Money Required

Every boy or girl who desires to take up this profitable work will receive, on request, the first ten copies free. The money received from the sale of these ten copies gives you capital to buy more at the wholesale price. You then not only make a generous profit on each copy you sell, but are given besides all sorts of premiums "live" boys and girls want, such as Watches, Rings, Fountain Pens, Knives, Cameras, Roller Skates, Snow Skates, Sleds, Electrical Toys, etc. You will really be surprised to know what unusually liberal inducements are offered for a little pleasant work.

Full particulars of the proposition are given in a handsome booklet, which contains illustrations and descriptions of the many special rewards. This Reward Book is sent free to every boy or girl who sends for the ten free copies. It will be advisable to write promptly for the free copies if you wish to become our agent, as some other boy or girl in your town may get ahead of you.

A Word to Parents

Every father and mother should encourage their boy or girl to take up this work, and to send for the ten free copies immediately. Besides enabling your child to earn many premiums and a weekly income in a few hours of spare time, this will act as a spur to the youthful ambitions of your boy or girl and lay the foundation for future habits of thrift, energy and perseverance. It will also teach the elements of salesmanship, and an ability to sell is the foundation of every business success in the world.

Every subscriber can help us in this splendid new undertaking. If you have no children of your own, but know boys and girls who are bright and ambitious, you will confer upon one of them a favor of inestimable value, as well as earn our grateful appreciation, by bringing this generous proposition to his or her attention. Please urge some boy or girl to take up the work now.

The cordial relationship that exists between THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its subscribers encourages us to believe that all kind friends who read this will extend their hearty co-operation to our new Junior Department. Remember, you will not only favor us and the boy or girl whom you speak to in regard to this proposition, but will enjoy the personal satisfaction of participating in the grand work of bringing comforting messages weekly to many new readers.

We confidently anticipate a gratifying success for our new undertaking, as we believe that whatever affords a good opportunity to boys and girls is sure to meet the approval and secure the assistance of our subscribers.

Act at Once

We urge every boy and girl to write to-day for the First Ten Free Copies and full particulars. If you start now, you can easily secure the exclusive agency for your town. Don't put this matter off until to-morrow, but sit down and write us at once. Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Junior Department, 94 Bible House, New York City.

REFUGEES IN MESSINA ON THE WAY TO THE RAILWAY TO LEAVE ON RELIEF TRAINS

ON Southern Italy the attention of all people is still riveted with sympathetic interest, as they read the reports of the heroic relief work that is being done there, much of it through outside aid. The recent and clearer reports only quicken the sympathy of Christian people in America and fill them with a strong desire to send something, even if it be but a small amount, to relieve the fearful sufferings of the refugees in the widespread earthquake districts. Much good work has been done in the vicinity of Messina, but there is still much more to do, and, as for the people in the country districts, they have practically been without outside aid of any kind. There has only been enough food to support a very small part of the population. Strong appeals for clothing are coming in constantly to the headquarters of relief operations in Messina, Syracuse and elsewhere, and a small quantity, purchased by American funds or furnished by the American women who are on the committee with Mrs. Griscom, has been distributed from the Bayern. Ambassador Griscom said, in giving his view of the situation to an Italian correspondent at Messina: "One of the many peculiar difficulties to be met with in relieving distress is the women and children of families whose breadwinners have been killed. These besiege the consulate with pleas for aid."

Distress in the Country Districts

An American correspondent got a steam tug and went on an expedition to Scylla. This district was dotted formerly with pretty little villages, most of them built on the side of the mountains. He found no villages; a scar on the mountain and a tumbled mass of beams and stone would mark the site of what had been the centre of life for several hundred people. The houses are destroyed, and all of the inhabitants are camped out, if it can be called camping where several families huddle together, sometimes with a fire, sometimes without, sleeping on the bare ground, half the time in a soaking rain, with barely enough to cover them. As for food, most that has been given out has not been sufficient to feed the people of the ruined cities. The poor villagers are glad to dig for roots. Those who were not injured by the fall of their hillside homes are now in a greatly weakened condition, either on account of lack of food or from eating food from which they would have turned in disgust a few weeks ago.

A brief visit to any of a hundred rural districts bears out the assertion of Baron des Planches, the Italian Ambassador at Washington, that the suffering in the country would not cease for months unless more help were forthcoming.

Bagnara and San Giovanni were both nearly destroyed, and the people are in urgent need of clothing and shelter. These shelters should be of cloth or canvas, for it is to court death to attempt to enter a more solid structure, as the shocks are continuing at intervals and here and there a house still falls, burying the people who had gone back to it. There are a large number of orphans in these two places, though a large number of them have been taken away to Florence and Naples. There are a number of new-born babies among them, and no one seems to know who is to take care of them or what is to become of them.

Those who think of Italy as only a land of sunny skies would change their mind if they had had to live out of doors in Sicily or Calabria for the last three weeks. The wind blows chill from the sea and the people stand about on the cold rocks, with perhaps only a blanket for protection, and feel the cold wind blow down from the mountains. Not for months has there been such a long period of bad weather as since the earthquake. Without doubt much of the weather disturbance is due to the recent convulsion. The seas about Sicily have also been exceedingly rough, large steamers keeping their course with difficulty.

British Sailors Carrying a Wounded Child to a Hospital

The Bayern steamed into view of the people camped about the shore cliffs of Messina, about five in the afternoon of Saturday, January 9. She was such a large vessel, and drew so much water, that she did not attempt to enter the harbor, but dropped anchor two kilometres off shore. Entering the harbor at this time with even a much lighter vessel would be dangerous. It is probable that the sea bottom has changed its level considerably, and it is strewn with wrecks whose spars and funnels might pierce the hulls of any ships which should pass over them.

The Bayern, all Americans will be pleased to learn, was under the command of an American naval officer, Captain Belknap, who has been for some time naval attaché at the embassy to Italy. Near by the United States gunboat Scorpion, which arrived within a day or two after the earthquake, and the Culgoa, loaded with supplies, were riding at anchor. Ambassador Griscom came ashore within an hour, in a small boat, and had a conference with the military commander of the Messina district, General Mazza.

The Americans found the scenes of desolation even worse than they had imagined from the dispatches. In fact, no previous disaster of modern times would furnish a basis for comparison. The city was still burning in places, and here and there great clouds of smoke hung over the ruins, giving the impression, to people a short distance off shore, that the disaster had occurred but a day or two before.

The same day the Yankton and Chicago, both cruisers of the United States Navy, arrived, making quite a little flotilla flying the Stars and Stripes. At once the sailors were put to work to do what they could to alleviate suffering, and to search for the bodies of missing Americans.

Sailors Help the Sufferers

In rowboats and the small steam cutters there was a constant procession of bluejackets from ships to shore. They brought tents, medicines, hospital supplies and food. The United States and British consular officers opened joint headquarters on the tennis courts at the north end of Messina, and from this port a large part of the relief operations are being carried on.

Work was again resumed at the ruins of the American consulate, in which the bodies of Mr. Cheney, the consul, and his wife lay buried. The sailors from the United States ships, supplemented by some hired Sicilian laborers, went to work with a will. After they had dug for a while they came upon the bodies of a man and a woman. The man was a Sicilian who had occupied a room on the third floor, and the woman evidently was one of the household servants. Again the searchers bent to their task. After a while a hat and several articles of clothing were found, which were identified as having belonged to Mrs. Cheney. No bodies as yet were discoverable which could be identified as those of any member of the American household. The wreckage was arched so high, and there was so much of it, that the American officers came to the conclusion that the floor on which the consul and his wife slept had fallen in at the first shock, before the walls tumbled in, and that the bodies must be covered by the debris of the entire building. At the time this is being written, the searchers had reached the office floor of the consulate.

One of the most astonishing things in connection with the earthquake is the extraordinary vitality shown by some of the people who have been entombed alive, and taken from the ruins days after the buildings fell. One man was taken out alive after being buried for seventeen days. One woman and her two children were rescued in another place. They had gone down with their house, but some beams had caught above their heads and saved their lives. They were in this living tomb for eleven days. The heroic mother kept her children alive by nursing them, but one of them died soon after being taken from the ruins. Fifteen days after the walls fell, one little baby was found in a heap of rubbish alive, but much emaciated. It will probably live. Its parents are dead. The hearts of the rugged workmen were greatly touched by the sight of the little waif, and it was carried tenderly to a temporary hospital.

One man and three women were dug out who had been terribly bruised and had been without food or water for twelve days. They were fearfully emaciated, almost living skeletons, but it is hoped that with proper food and care they may regain their strength in part.

The injured are being transported to Genoa, Naples, Palermo, and other places where camps have been established. Large numbers of the injured who were placed on board ships have died, and many who were sent away on the improvised ambulance trains died before their destination was reached.

The Culgoa landed thirty tons of food for the sick in the hospitals, and then further extended its errands of mercy, at the request of the Italians, along the stricken coast. The Bayern and Culgoa distributed quite a quantity of stores at Reggio, which the survivors eagerly welcomed. The famished people, in a great many instances, sat down just where they were and devoured the food ravenously.

One American lady, writing from Taormina, which, having suffered little from the shock, has been used as a refuge by hundreds, says: "All of the bakers of Taormina were kept baking bread, being paid by contributions from the foreign colony. We did everything possible to obtain clothing to cover the shivering, naked people. Many children had been made orphans by the earthquake. A lady who intended to go to Messina the day before the earthquake saved her life by postponing her departure. She has taken charge of a little girl refugee, and if the child is not claimed will adopt her. I was much struck by the behavior of the refugees. They seemed dazed with terror and suffering, but were uncomplaining. They were ready to share whatever was given them with each other, and even those suffering most did not neglect to thank us."

Reports from the east coast of Sicily show that the numbers of orphan children who have absolutely no known relatives left to care for them is indeed appalling. It is probable that in many cases where the parents still live they will be unable to find their little ones, for the refugees have been distributed all up and down the coasts, and a reunion seems almost beyond hope. Some of the little ones are almost speechless from the remembrance of the scenes of terror through which they have passed, and they are like startled deer when a stranger speaks to them.

Italy is still in a state of panic. On January 13 the northern part of Italy was shocked. No buildings were destroyed, but the people, whose nerves are all unstrung by the terrifying reports from the south, became wild with fright. They gathered in the public squares, and it was some time before they dared re-enter their homes.

Their Gifts Sent with Prayers

Seldom has an appeal to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in behalf of suffering humanity brought responses so touching and so immediate as those that are now coming to us by every mail. These gifts come from all classes, even the poorest gladly grasping the opportunity to have a share in so Christlike a work of rescue and life-saving. From the fulness of their hearts they write, and almost every gift is sanctified with a prayer that it may be the means of saving life and relieving suffering. We give a few extracts:

"May God help them in this hour of trouble," writes Mrs. J. W. B., Midnight, O. ($1). "May our Father bless your efforts to relieve some of the sick and wounded in this terrible earthquake," writes B. B. C., Durango, Ia. ($2). "I hope that God's people will nobly respond to your earnest appeal" is the prayer of Mrs. F. W. H., East St. Louis, Ill. ($1).

"I was hungry and ye gave me meat," writes Miss C. E., Ithaca, N. Y. ($5). "May God's blessing go with it. I wish it were more," is the prayer of Mrs. E. C., in sending $1 to the Fund. "Use this where you think it will do the most immediate good," writes W. E. M., Center, Mont. ($10).

A reader, who prefers to remain unknown, sends $2, with this touching little verse:

For Italy's dying children,
This little sum I give,
And trust that Christ will use it,
That some poor soul may live.

Improvised Homes in the Outskirts of Messina

Churches Aiding the Good Work

Mr. T. D. Killion, of the American Book Company, Atlanta, Ga., sends $6.45, representing a list of sixteen contributors. The Reformed Church, of Westwood, N. J., through Mr. T. E. Brickell, forwards its offering of $31.41, to be added to the Relief Fund. The First Presbyterian Church, of Belvidere, N. J., through Mr. A. M. Cammon, treasurer, sends a contribution of $18.26, and the Central M. E. Church, of Asheville, N. C., sends $3.50. "Our prayers go with this gift," writes Rev. J. G. Eller, pastor of the Diversey Boulevard Evangelical Church, of Chicago, in sending a contribution of $41.25. "Every little helps in a disaster like this; I only wish I could send more," writes Mrs. R. E., Le Roy, N. Y. ($1). "I send this ($1) with God's blessing, wishing it may help a little," is the devout prayer of Mrs. F. O. H., Penn's Park, Pa.

The Young Ladies' Association of the Congregational Church of Alexandria, O., sends $8 and invokes God's blessing on the work. Three friends in Bridgeton, N. J.—H. A. H. ($12), E. A. H. ($2) and S. S. A. ($1)—combine to aid the work of rescue. "When I read in your earnest appeal that one-half lira will keep a human being alive for a day I decided to send my contribution," writes F. B., Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

Many of the contributors send their gifts anonymously; but the heartfelt aspiration which shows the deep sympathy of the sender is never missing. Some send the "widow's mite," which is as welcome as the largest offering. Others give in loving memory of some dear one now dead. An unknown giver in Clarksdale, Mo., adds to her offering, "May God be merciful to them in every way."

The poor Italian women and the children are not forgotten. "I pray for the children," writes a contributor in Knoxville, Tenn., "that they may be taught to love Jesus." "Thank you for sending this for me," writes an anonymous friend in Montclair, N. J., "and I pray God's increase and blessing upon it." Still another anonymous donor sends a dollar, with "I wish it were more, but I send it with my sympathy and love." "It is truly an awful calamity," write Mr. and Mrs. H. O. S., Bloomington, Ill.; "may the Lord bless and help."

Save the Women and Children

Many readers write us warmly approving the plan of a special effort in behalf of the poor Italian mothers and children, who are homeless and bereaved. There are thousands of such cases coming to the knowledge of the relief workers. The Queen of Italy, a kind, tender-hearted woman, is doing what she can to aid these helpless ones, and the Italian Ambassador in Washington has assured us that she will personally supervise the distribution of any gifts that may be sent from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund for this purpose.

Send in your gifts, however small, with all haste and have a share in this great benevolence. Every contribution will be acknowledged in these columns. All remittances from the Fund are made through the State Department in Washington, which, Mr. Secretary Bacon assures us, "is proud to be the medium through which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD transmits its benefactions." But a greater blessing will accrue to the donors than that which comes from any human approval. They will have in their own breasts the consciousness that they have done what they could for His sake, whose heart was ever open to the cry of the poor and the distressed.

WETHANDAYA, "KING OF GREAT GIFTS"

A Strange Buddhist Classic, Interpreted by a Missionary for The Christian Herald

FROM Mrs. Sarah Wirt Peoples, American missionary at Nan, Burma, and a frequent contributor, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a translation of one of the sacred Burmese books—the Wethandaya—which is regarded as one of the most remarkable productions of Oriental literature. Illustrations which accompany the translation were made especially for this journal by Nai Tun, for fifteen years a Buddhist priest and now a Christian convert and leader of the prayer meeting of the Nan Mission. The translation, which is by Mr. O. White, is from the Pali Buddhist books, which are inscribed upon palm leaves and used in all of the Buddhist temples. "Much of the story has fine moral truth," Mrs. Peoples writes; "but all that Buddha taught has been fulfilled in Christ."

A "Yahoo" (Spirit) which Swallows Sun and Moon and Causes Eclipses

The story of Wethandaya is one of the Buddhist classics. It opens with the marriage of Prince Theinzi, of the kingdom of Thiwi, to Princess Pothadi. This princess had offered up a prayer in a previous existence, "ninety-one worlds ago," says the chronicle, when she was the daughter of King Kikeitha. She gave charity, was very religious, and became Queen of the Thagya-min, an inferior order of celestial beings. When she was about to die, she was accorded ten favors, because of her goodness and gentleness. The last favor was that she might by her influence be able to save those who were condemned to death for having committed an offense. She died and was reborn in the city of Madarit, as the King's daughter, and received the same name she had in her former existence.

After marrying Prince Theinzi, Pothadi became Queen, and had sixteen thousand maids and attendants. To her was born a son who was destined to be a Pralaung, or holy one, and sixty thousand nats or genii were reborn in as many different noble families in order that they might be his companions. Queen Pothadi, it is related, in honor of her son's birth, built six rest-houses or chambers, and gave 600,000 things daily as alms. From this omen the soothsayers declared that the child would delight in charity and be constantly doing good. The child was named Wethandaya. When he was four years old he began his deeds of charity, giving away his necklaces and jewels. At eight, his wonderful charities caused a great earthquake. At eighteen, he was so wise and good that King Theinzi abdicated in his favor. About this time King Wethandaya was married to Princess Madi. Their children were Prince Zali and Princess Ganazein.

Wethandaya Gives his Sacred White Elephant to the Begging Brahmans

Wethandaya as King was more devoted to good deeds than ever. Six times every month he went around among his people on a white elephant, doing good. He gave his beautiful elephant to the priests of Kalinga, a neighboring kingdom, as a gift to allay the famine which raged there. Its ornaments alone cost 2,400,000 pieces of gold. He also gave 500 families to attend the elephant. When he made this great gift, the land was shaken with an earthquake. His subjects rebelled against this generosity, but his father defended his act. They insisted, however, that he should no longer be King, so his father King Theinzi sent a minister to apprize him of their demand. Wethandaya declared that he was prepared to give away even his arms, eyes and heart for charity. He was willing that his people should banish or kill him, but he would not cease to give charity. He was accordingly banished to Mount Ayeinsara, the residence of exiled kings, but before leaving he made a great offering of 700 things. Queen Madi decided to share his exile, together with her children, and in a very beautiful and poetic passage she describes the duties of a true and faithful wife toward her husband in misfortune.

All the Brahman beggars partook of Wethandaya's "great gift," and lamented his going, while they extolled his virtues. He gave, among other things, 700 elephants with their riders, 700 horses and riders, 700 carriages each with a driver and 8 maidens in every carriage, 1,400 men and maid-servants, 700 cows and 700 silver milk bowls. While the offering was going on, Wethandaya prayed that it might help him in attaining omniscience. Then followed another earthquake. His mother gave him her parting blessing and wished he might acquire certain extraordinary faculties and great wisdom, together with the title to rebirth in one of the Brahma heavens. On his departure he gave away his four carriage horses, and the good genii sent four wild bulls to draw it. Finally, a beggar Brahman asked for the carriage, which was given him unhesitatingly, and the exiles set out on foot, the King carrying one child, the Queen the other. Trees bent down their branches to yield their fruit to the travelers and the road was miraculously shortened. At the capital of Queen Madi's father they were urged to stay, but declined; they must press on to the mountain and the forest.

With a hunter as guide, they at last reached the forest. They ate of the wild fruit and drank of the crystal water. Meanwhile the nats or genii had prepared cells for the exiles and sleeping chambers on the Wingaba hill. Reaching his cell, Wethandaya assumed the simple hermit garb of a rahan and the Queen that of a yathe-ma; also the dresses of the children were changed. Madi served them, daily bringing fruit from the forest, in which, through the influence of Wethandaya's good deeds, all the wild animals lived in perfect peace.

Wethandaya's next great deed of charity (so-called) was the giving away of his two children to a worthless old Brahman named Zuzaka, who wished them for household drudges. This extraordinary generosity on Wethandaya's part produced another earthquake. One supreme test of his benevolence still remained, however. The Thagya-min, or chief deity of the genii, who had been directing all these trials and temptations unknown to the King, now appeared to Wethandaya in the guise of a venerable Brahman, and asked for alms. The poor recluse, however, had nothing left. Estate and children gone, he and his poor wife were absolutely destitute of anything to give. The Brahman suggested that the Pralaung could give his wife, and this the King, now thoroughly convinced that the gods designed to strip him of everything, agreed to, though with many a heart-pang. Madi, too, though well-nigh heart-broken over the loss of her children, bowed to the will of the Pralaung and prepared to depart with the stranger. But at this moment the supposed Brahman revealed himself to the exiled husband and wife as a great deity, who had been putting Wethandaya through all of these trials in order that he might be found worthy of becoming a Phaya. Now he had proved his worthiness, and the Thagya-min, disclosing to him the purpose of his trials, assured him that all of his dear ones, his throne and his kingdom would be restored to him, and that he would be greatly blessed in this world and in the other incarnations through which he would pass thereafter. The Thagya-min then disappears. The climax of Wethandaya's last and greatest trial is followed by another earthquake, all these seismic disturbances, it is explained, indicating the great perturbation in the under-world of nats (genii) over each successive charitable deed of the exiled monarch.

A "Nat" or Good Genie, who Loves to Help Worthy Mortals

His father, King Theinzi, being apprised of the place of his son's exile and deciding to recall him to his kingdom, sets out with a great retinue of 60,000 persons, accompanied by the Queen and by Wethandaya's two children, whom he has redeemed by purchase from the wicked Brahman Zuzaka. The meeting between the Kings at the lonely mountain retreat, the triumphant return of Wethandaya and Madi to their kingdom, and the welcome of the people are all fully described. But the story would be incomplete without the concluding chapter, which shows how the superior powers bless those who are charitable and kind. On reaching his capital Wethandaya said to himself:

> When the mendicants hear of my arrival they will come begging in the morning. What shall I give as offerings? The Thagya-min next morning caused a shower of the seven precious stones to fall within the palace to the depth of a man's waist. On that part of the city which was outside the palace he caused the shower of precious stones to fall knee-deep. At daybreak the next morning the Pralaung Wethandaya gave the people permission to take for themselves the precious stones that fell within their enclosures. All the gems that fell outside their fences and on the king's highway, as also those that fell on the wall and within the palace, he ordered to be collected and put into the royal treasury. By the shower of precious stones the people became very rich. King Wethandaya also to the end of his life was, by means of these precious stones, enabled to give offerings every day, and at his death he passed away to that country which is the abode of those who do good deeds.

Zuzaka, the Wily Brahman, Begs the Two Children of Wethandaya

So ends this quaint old heathen record, which, although it has nothing of the light of Christianity, is not without its moral. Amid a mass of superstition and exaggeration, it exalts charity as one of the greatest virtues that can be practised by the race of men. It places character above wealth and rank, and teaches that goodness is better than greatness.

No Halt in the Relief Work

STUNNED by the disaster which overwhelmed two of her fairest provinces, Italy has not yet fully awakened to a realization of the terrible loss she has sustained. Partial exploration of the ruined cities and villages reveals a general devastation greater than could have been pictured even in the worst anticipations. Beautiful cities are heaps of ruins, and the problem of rebuilding is one which can only be considered in the distant future. At the present time, with all Italy still shaking with the intermittent seismic disturbances, the immediate question is one solely of rescue and relief for the destitute survivors of the earthquake in Sicily and Calabria.

Our readers are responding with their accustomed promptness and generosity to this new call to service. The homeless and bereaved mothers and little children, who may be counted by the tens of thousands, have a first claim upon the loving charity of God's people. There are, besides, the aged and the injured, who should not be forgotten. With their loved ones lying dead beneath mountains of debris, and with poignant sorrow blinding them to their own needs of food, clothing and shelter, they must perish unless aid is quickly extended.

Let us hasten the life-saving work. Let every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD decide now to save at least one poor sufferer. A contribution to the Fund now will assure this. "He that gives quickly gives twice." Send in your gift to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Italian Relief Fund to-day, and seek out an opportunity, if you can, to influence your friends to have a share in the rescue of these stricken multitudes. May God open the hearts of his people everywhere to respond to this appeal at the crisis of their need.

The Need of Missionaries

"ARE we not sending too many missionaries abroad?" writes one of the readers of this journal. By no means. When Christ gave the "Great Commission" to his followers he meant that they should carry his Gospel of a free and full salvation to all the world. Even with the thousands of workers in the field, it is still a palpable fact in all the great missionary lands that the number of laborers is sadly disproportionate to the vastness of the harvest.

As an illustration of the need, we may point out that in a single corner of the great Chinese empire—in the three provinces of Yunnan, Szechuen and Kweichow, with 80,000,000 population—there is a mere handful of missionaries. Fifteen hundred workers are called for in these provinces alone; but, after all, that would be only one missionary to every 50,000 heathen. Other fields in Central Africa, parts of Asia and South America are almost equally needy. There is such need of the Gospel in these and other quarters of the globe that some of the large missionary boards feel justified in greatly increasing their working forces at the front.

There is much yet to be done to fulfil the Master's wish and command. Let each do his or her part, and we can safely leave the result with Him.

Saving Niagara Falls

FOR several years tourists who have journeyed to Niagara Falls have felt that perhaps they were among the last who would see the cataract in all its glory and magnificence, an awe-inspiring spectacle the like of which exists nowhere else upon the surface of the earth. Of course, there are other great falls, but only one Niagara. People have watched with extreme disfavor the blasting of sluiceways and the construction of great buildings, destined to turn the falls into commercial power, but destined as well, in the end, to ruin the falls and leave but a small body of water to slip like a thin veil off the gigantic cliff. What happens when a waterfall is put entirely to commercial uses is shown at Cohoes, N. Y., on the Mohawk. The falls, while they could in no way be compared with Niagara, were nevertheless once very beautiful. At present, when the mills are in operation, the water makes but a small rivulet. There was good excuse for the appropriation of part of the Mohawk power, which in no way exists at Niagara. The latter really should belong to the nation, or at least on that side over which the United States has control.

A recent agreement made between Canada and our government is a step toward checking the destruction of the falls. It is called the Waterways Treaty, and part of it regulates the use of the water at Niagara Falls in such a way as to preserve its great scenic beauty. The United States will be allowed to use 20,000 cubic feet per second to develop 236,000 horse-power, while Canada will have a limit of 36,000 cubic feet, which will be sufficient to develop 425,000 horse-power. The treaty terminates after a number of years, but there will be time enough to prove its value.

This is a step in the right direction, though it might be heartily wished that it were a much longer step. It is to be hoped that, between now and the time the treaty will expire, public sentiment, both in Canada and in the United States, will be sufficiently aroused to prevent not only any further encroachment on the natural beauty of the falls, but to make their further exploitation, either by the State or for private gain, an impossibility. Already too many memorable objects in America are preserved only in the form of paintings or photographs. We should save something in its reality for the coming generations, who otherwise will not have a very high opinion of the wisdom and foresight of their forebears.

Going to Church

THERE are still towns in this country of ours in which it is the custom for almost everybody to attend church. In these, on Sunday mornings when the first bell rings, doors open on every street and people dressed in their best step from their homes with happy faces intent on seeking a place of worship. Unfortunately, the good old custom is no longer universally observed in our large cities. Too many different streams from the Old World have met and mingled in the cosmopolitan centres, and there has been too large an infusion of a pagan element to keep the old landmarks unimpaired. People from alien shores, trained often with no regard for religion, have come to us looking for an asylum from oppression. Our own people, growing richer, have also grown more worldly, and there has been a gradual neglect of church privileges on the part of those who should set a good example.

It is undeniable that the members of society who are most to be depended upon for upholding the laws, the families who make the real strength of a nation, the friends it is most desirable to know, have the habit of going to church. It is hardly too much to say that the self-respecting people in a neighborhood are those who may be found regularly in the pews on Sunday morning. To be identified with a church is, therefore, to be connected more or less intimately with the best men and women in the vicinity, the kindest, the most sympathetic and the most thoughtful. There is no better way to find friends in a strange place than to look for them in a church selected carefully and attended regularly.

Those who make it their habit to be in the pew on Sunday may be poor or rich, may be learned or illiterate, may be traveled or provincial. These attributes make no difference, because the people have in common this uplifting fact that it is their custom to keep holy the Sabbath and to worship the Lord in his house on his day. This single excellent custom helps to make them desirable companions and good folk to know.

It is pleasant, too, glancing at the face of the minister in the pulpit, to see what encouragement he receives from beholding his congregation arranged before him, in their accustomed places in the old-fashioned family pews. Some of us can contribute very little in money to the running expenses of the church; some are aware that they have no special gift of eloquence or persuasiveness in the prayer meeting. If only those who feel discouraged in recognition of a lack could realize the help they give by their personal presence they would better comprehend their worth on the score of punctuality and responsibility.

"A Sabbath well spent brings a week of content" is a homely distich. Its truth has been verified in the experience of thousands. One advantage of going to church on Sunday is discovered on Monday, on Tuesday and on Wednesday, for the week's work starts better, proceeds more smoothly and leads to more favorable results when honor has been paid to the Lord in the assembly of his people on the day of rest.

"THE WEDDING RING"

Views Held by the Late T. DeWitt Talmage

WE HAVE on hand a limited number of copies of one of the most inspired and inspiring works of the late Dr. Talmage, THE WEDDING RING, which, in order to make shelf room for new publications, we now offer to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the low price of 25 cents each.

Marriage is a subject near to the heart of all mankind; universally interesting; tremendously important; and here is a volume which has never failed to carry a blessed influence into every home where it has gone. The wise counsel which Dr. Talmage gives in these discourses to husbands and wives, young people and parents, and his interpretation of Scriptural passages bearing on the marriage bond and the sacredness of home ties, must leave a deep impression on one and all. His advice on "The Choice of a Husband" and "The Choice of A Wife," and his able talks on "The Relation of Wife to Husband and Husband to Wife," have helped hundreds upon hundreds of readers to act carefully and judiciously in those matters, large and small, that so often decide the destinies of loved ones for time and eternity, or upon which rests the happiness of the home.

It would be hard to say which of the fourteen chapters in this absorbing book are more vitally interesting, but certainly those on "Easy Divorce," "Matrimonial Discords" and "Clandestine Marriages" are particularly pertinent in this day. The chapter on "Maternity" appeals warmly to every mother, and "Woman Enthroned" should be read by every member of the gentler sex.

These beautiful books are in no way damaged or worn, and, as the remaining stock will doubtless be entirely closed out within a very short time, we urge every reader who desires a copy to write us at once. Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York City.

"Called Higher" and "Answered Prayers"

WHILE we are always glad to print communications received from friends for our departments "Called Higher" and "Answered Prayers," we have on hand at present so many more notices and letters of this nature than we can possibly take care of that we earnestly desire our readers not to feel it a personal slight, or inattention on our part, when such an item does not receive prompt attention. We are devoting as much room in the paper as we possibly can to these two departments, and regret exceedingly that we are not able to stretch the space to meet the demands of our mail.

Americans Visit the Pyramids

THIS is the time of year when people who are able to do so are making what is called the Mediterranean trip, and are prosecuting interesting journeys through Egypt and Palestine.

The best scholars and writers are describing the natural scenery, the inhabitants and the customs of those ancient countries so graphically that we turn to the reading of our Bibles with new light and faith. Such a trip is not considered complete until the travelers shall have had a talk with the Sphinx and lined up for a photograph of themselves, including the pyramids. What wonderful stories those pyramids could tell this jolly company of travelers if they would only use their tongues!—what the people looked like in olden times; how they got the blocks of stone one upon another; what kings ruled the nation. But the stones are unresponsive. They have forgotten the very hands that built them. They can scarcely remember the names of the kings whose honor they were to commemorate. What eloquent things the Sphinx could say if it would about the people and customs, the ambitions, the joys, the sorrows and the contests of that far-off time! But the riddle is unsolved, and the silence is as breathless as it has been for these thousands of years.

There is an important lesson which this living company may learn of these solitary landmarks of a dead past, and that is that the law of oblivion is on all material things; that the dust of time has covered from mortal sight most of the things men ever made with their fingers. The Sphinx and the pyramids have looked down upon just as handsome, ruddy-faced, happy-hearted people as this group of American travelers, century after century, and seen them go down into the dust. History records now and then the name of a general, but does not care anything for the names of the other officers and the private soldiers that have fought through the thousands of years. Most men and buildings and human institutions have gone down under the flood of years—only a Sphinx and pyramid left as a reminder of the universal ruin that time has wrought. The veil of obscurity hides the future, the pall of oblivion covers the past, that men may be driven to diligence and duty in the living present.

With the Sphinx, the pyramids and oblivion as a background, the living tourists appear and will appear until the last stone of the monuments shall have disappeared beneath the sands. For life and love and faith and hope cannot be covered up by the dust of time; they are immortal.

My days are like a shadow that declineth; and I am withered like grass. But thou, O Lord, shalt endure forever; and thy remembrance unto all generations. (Ps. 102 : 11, 12.)

American Visitors Under the Shadow of the Pyramids and the Sphinx

Gave Away His Tin Soldiers

Queen Helena of Italy, instead of celebrating the anniversary of her birth in the usual manner, did so by working doubly hard for the Calabrian and Sicilian survivors, whose sufferings have almost prostrated her body and distracted her mind. Her two daughters—Princess Yolanda and Princess Mafalda, respectively seven and six years old—instead of buying birthday presents for their mother, turned over the contents of their money-boxes to the relief fund. The little Crown Prince, who is four years old, not wishing to be outdone by his sisters, parted with what has been his greatest delight—a company of tin soldiers, of which he is the commander. He took his toys to his mother, saying, "This is all I have; please send them to the poor children."

The conduct of the King and Queen and royal family of Italy in the time of dire calamity is a beautiful example to their nation and the world at large. They have demonstrated their right of leadership by their bravery, tireless industry, intense sympathy and devotion to God and country. Real royalty is not in crowns, or thrones, or plumes, or epaulets, or wardrobes, or palaces, or cabinets, or armies, or navies, but in right thinking, warm loving and unselfish devotion to the interests of others.

Mercy and truth preserve the king: and his throne is upholden by mercy. (Prov. 20 : 28.)

Advice of Governor Folk's Mother

The mother of Governor Folk, of Missouri, has just published a book. Of the many important things of which she writes, there is nothing of deeper interest than that which refers to the training of boys. Among other things on this subject, she says:

First, boys must have the right descent. I would not know what to do with a boy who traced his ancestors to the zoological garden instead of the Garden of Eden.

Mother, when asking temporal blessings for your boy, redouble your prayers for heavenly wisdom. True greatness only comes from above. Is your boy on the road to riches? Well, then, give him Burdette's advice: "Don't travel the Jericho route unless you are stronger than the thieves. Stay in Jerusalem." Wealth of character, riches of mind and heart are more to be desired than gold for your boy. Prayer, communion with God, teach him these.

Wait not until his soul is starved, until he becomes a moral and physical wreck and has gone down to the level of brutes, until your own heart has winter's chill, before you give him spiritual nourishment. The supply must be bountiful. Merely an occasional view of the Glorified One will not keep your boy from faltering under life's fierce trials.

This is wholesome advice, which mothers could take to great advantage. God has so arranged it that Christian motherhood, home's greatest ornament, should be childhood's best protection, instruction and inspiration. No one can ever measure the influence of a good mother upon the sons and daughters who go out into practical life to perform its duties, to bear its burdens, to dispense its charities and to establish the kingdom of heaven. There is a close secret wire of communication between a Christian mother's heart and the men and women who do the work of the world and shape its destiny.

When I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice; and I am persuaded that in thee also. (II. Tim. 1:5.)

A Fortune in a Tomato Can

Patrick Sullivan, an ice-wagon driver of East St. Louis, Ill., recently found a $10,000 bill in the bottom of an old tomato can he picked up in an alley. The cashier of the Southern Illinois National Bank examined the bill through a microscope, and said it appeared to be a genuine gold certificate. Who put it there, or for what purpose, no one could tell. It was likely placed in the can for safe keeping, and was thrown out as trash by mistake. It may have been hidden away by some person who, dying suddenly, could not care for it. Whoever it was that left it, Patrick Sullivan found it, and was accounted by his acquaintances as a very lucky man.

The safe and normal way to make money is to earn it by some labor of body or mind. The unusual thing is to find it in old tomato cans. The man who puts the money in the tomato can by raising the vegetable on his farm, and the man who makes the tin can in the factory, and the one who puts the fruit into the can, and the one who sells it, create values in the normal and healthy way. It would be a very unfortunate thing for society if people got their money by finding it in old tomato cans in the alley.

For thou shalt eat the labor of thine hands: happy shalt thou be, and it shall be well with thee. (Ps. 128 : 2.)

Enormous Wealth of France

Although general trade conditions in France, as in other European countries, suffered in 1908 largely because of the reduction in American demand, statistics tell of the wonderful wealth of the nation, establishing for it the title of "the world's banker." Aside from the gold and securities which the French people, especially the peasants, keep in concealment, the nation has all the evidences of fabulous wealth. The French people save a billion dollars a year, much of which seeks investment abroad. They now receive $360,000,000 as an annual income from foreign holdings, the amount having been almost doubled in the last fifteen years. M. Leroy-Beaulieu estimates the present wealth of the French people at forty-five billion dollars, or more than $1,100 for every man, woman and child.

In beauty, art, letters and patriotism, France has kept pace with her industry and economy; but in increase of population and in the spirituality of her religion she has hardly done so.

Arise, get you up unto the wealthy nation. (Jer. 49 : 31.)

An Enemy of Consumption

Next to the original Koch discovery of the bacilli of tuberculosis is that made by Dr. Randle C. Rosenberger, bacteriologist at Jefferson Medical College in Philadelphia. It is a simple method by which any physician, with his ordinary office equipment, can discover the first appearance of the germ of consumption in the blood, which is sometimes long before the germs begin to attack the lungs and manifest themselves in the sputum. The benefits of this discovery are incalculable. It will lead to the discovery of the disease in its incipiency before its ravages have begun to waste the system and deprive it of its natural resistance, in which stage it yields the more easily to the modern method of treatment, based upon pure air, pure food and rest. It is possible that this discovery will lead to another one which would be the greatest medical discovery in a thousand years. That is, a system of vaccination against tuberculosis may be found which will render persons as immune against consumption as they may now be made against smallpox by vaccination, and in time the white plague, which slays its hundreds of thousands every year, may become as nearly extirpated as is smallpox at the present time. Dr. Rosenberger admits that he is not without hope that such a result will follow the adoption of his new treatment.

It would be a cause of universal congratulation if God, who is the author of all life and health, were to reveal to his children the weapon with which they could defeat this deadly enemy of mankind. There is no form of moral disease which the Great Physician cannot cure.

And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people. (Matt. 4 : 23.)

Questions and Answers

R. S. R., Newark, N. J. Now that the real cold winter weather is upon us, why do not the churches and other charitable places open up their warm basements to the poor and unfortunate to sleep in, as was done the latter part of last winter? Or was there objection to this?

A few churches in different cities did this last winter, we believe. The suggestion that it be done generally was not very favorably received, especially in the larger cities.

Mrs. B. F. T., W. Hoboken, N. J. In the Apostles' Creed is this sentence: "I believe in the resurrection of the body." Does this mean our earthly body? Where is it referred to in the Bible?

The Creed is not in the Bible. Tradition says it was composed by the apostles after the ascension of Christ and agreed upon as a rule of faith. Jude, the brother of James, is given as the author of the passage on resurrection, which may be construed to mean either the natural or spiritual body. Other accounts hold that the Creed, in its present form at least, is not earlier than the fourth century. It has undergone many changes from the original. See recent paragraphs on the subject in THE MAIL-BAG.

J. B., Detroit, Mich. How many European, and how many American missionaries are in the foreign field at the present time?

Approximately 6,500 from the United States; United Kingdom and Ireland 8,000, Continental Europe 3,000. India has 1,300 American missionaries, about 2,400 from Great Britain and 400 from Continental Europe. Africa has 600 American, 1,400 British and 1,000 Continental. American foreign missions added over 87,000 communicants last year, or about 12 per cent.—a magnificent increase.

Reader, Kansas City, Mo. The church of to-day is responsive to the cry that sounds from every quarter of the globe for aid to the struggling and elevation to the masses. It is more and more doing what it can to promote the brotherhood of man. Few recent utterances carry a more thrilling message than the declaration of faith of the Methodist Episcopal Church at its last quadrennial conference. Its platform declared for equal rights and complete justice for all men in all stations of life: for conciliation and arbitration in industrial dissensions; for the protection of the worker from dangerous machinery, occupational diseases, injuries and mortality; abolition of child labor; regulation of the conditions of labor for women; suppression of the "sweating system"; reduction of hours of labor to the lowest practical point with work for all; recognition of the Golden Rule and the mind of Christ as the supreme law of society and the sure remedy for social ills.

D. C., Providence, R. I. What is the orbit of the comet that is expected in 1910? Or, what centre does it revolve around?

The comet which will approach us next year is known as Halley's comet, one of fifteen comets known to have a periodicity. Its orbit is parabolic, and so large as to require about seventy-six of our years to make a revolution. It doubles around our sun at one end of its orbit, and then plunges into space again at a fearful speed, to return only after more than two generations of men have gone to their dreamless sleep. The comet may at any time be lost to us, and pass from our sky into some other constellation, to return to us no more. Many of these celestial visitors have left our sky forever. SAMUEL PHELPS LELAND.

J. A. C., De Land, Ill. What became of the ark of the covenant?

The whereabouts of the ark is an unsolved mystery to this day. Some writers suppose it to have been secreted among the underground passages beneath the temple buildings.

Mrs. S. R. S., Chautauqua, N. Y. 1. Why does it not rain in some parts of California from May to October? 2. Why does the wind blow from the south until the storm comes, when it blows from the west or north?

We have referred this letter to the Weather Bureau, Washington, D. C., and Professor Cleveland Abbe, of the Central Office of the Bureau, has kindly replied as follows:

"1. Rain almost invariably accompanies and implies a steady current of rising air. On the Pacific coast the air is apt to be so dry that it does not rise high enough to form cloud and rain. It may flow inward many miles, rising a few thousand feet, and then stop or flow back on itself. This occurs especially when the coast is within the influence of a great area of high pressure and descending air that characterizes the trade wind region. During the winter, from November to April, the northern part of the coast is under the influence of the great system of westerly winds. These are not always felt at sea level, but prevail at a short distance above, and carry great masses of moist air against the summits of the Sierra Nevada. As this air rises it gives rain to the lowlands but snow to the mountain tops. 2. A stormy region is a large area within which there is a central low barometric pressure, around which the wind blows. On its southeast side we have winds from the southeast and southwest; and on its northwest side we have northeast to northwest winds. As the whole storm moves bodily eastward over your station, you get the southerly winds first, then the lowest pressure and the heaviest winds and at last the cold northwest winds."

J. B., Kimball, S. D., writes: "I see an article concerning the 'Soldier Preacher,' George Jones, of Woodside, N. Y., as having participated in the siege of Sebastopol, and who is supposed to be the only eye-witness now living in America. There is one other, James Boyd, born in Scotland, 1837, enlisted in Glasgow in the Fusilier Guards, and was out in the Crimean War from start to finish. He was at the siege of Sebastopol and also at Balaklava, Inkermann and Alma. Came to the United States in the fall of 1861. Enlisted in Company A, 24th Iowa, in 1862, and served three years during the rebellion; was discharged in 1865."

E. B. J., Greenwich Village, Mass. Of what religious belief were the Pilgrims and Puritans? Were the Puritans of the Unitarian belief?

The Pilgrims believed in the Bible as an infallible guide in all matters of church and government. "In every crisis they inquired at the oracle of Jehovah; in seasons of deliverance they entered his courts with praise." They cut completely away from the Church of England, and might be called separatists. The Puritans were so called for the reason that they wished at first to remain in the Church of England and purify it from certain forms of worship and church government which they regarded as objectionable. They were not Unitarians, but strict Trinitarians, as were the Pilgrims. The name Puritan remained long after they too had ceased to have any connection with the Church of England. In New England the Pilgrims and Puritans merged, and our present Congregational churches are the direct successors of their churches.

Mrs. A. G. S., Mansfield, Pa. Kindly suggest some topics suitable for a Sunday School convention.

There are several topics which might profitably be discussed. Among them are: 1. Special training courses for Sunday School teachers. 2. Should the Sunday School teacher be paid or an unpaid volunteer? 3. Sunday School conversions—are they declining or otherwise? 4. The importance of the Sunday School as a feeder for the church. 5. The best way to build up the Sunday School, which involves the consideration of Sunday School methods. 6. The relation of the pastor to the Sunday School. 7. Sunday School music and musical training, its importance as an adjunct to success. 8. The advisability of keeping the spiritual and benevolent interest constantly active by taking up some work which will occupy the attention and bring out the best efforts of the school.

Questioner, Hempstead, N. Y. 1. Who is the present President of Liberia? 2. Has Liberia any railroads or universities?

1. Arthur Barclay is President of Liberia. He was born in 1854, and was elected president in 1907. 2. You can get information about the means of transportation in Liberia by addressing the U. S. consul, Hon. Ernest Lyon, Monrovia, Liberia. It has no universities.

E. M. W., Hazlet, N. J. Has any one ever been able to read the Etruscan language?

It is reported that the key of the Etruscan language (which preceded the Roman) has only lately been discovered by some scientists and philologists investigating in Italy. Nothing definite has yet been published, but further developments may shed an interesting light on this ancient race.

Our recent MAIL-BAG paragraph concerning the first temperance pledge has brought the following letter from an Illinois reader:

"As apropos to the subject, I give from J. B. Jeter's Recollections of a Long Life this sketch of the incipient stages of the temperance movement in Virginia:

" 'Some time during the summer of 1822 we (the author and a comrade named Pitt) were attending a meeting at Hatcher's meeting house, and had spent the night at a brother White's. In the morning, as was the custom, a decanter of spirits, with sugar and water, was passed, and we were invited to partake. We were led into a conversation on the subject. We concluded that it was not only a useless habit, but fraught with pernicious consequences. We then and there, on a bright and beautiful Sabbath morning, mutually resolved to abstain during the remainder of our lives from the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage. We pledged ourselves, each to the other, in a hearty shaking of hands. That two lads, living in obscurity, should resolve to abstain from using intoxicating liquor as a beverage, while all their neighbors continued the practice, seemed to be unworthy of record. That Sabbath morning pledge caused Rev. Abner Clopton to abstain from using strong drink, and led on to the formation of the Virginia Temperance Society, which was organized in the autumn of 1826.' QUEEN HELENA'S MESSAGE

She is Grateful for America's Aid for the Earthquake Widows and Orphans

The Christian Herald has received the following letter from the Italian Ambassador in Washington, Baron E. Mayor des Planches:

REGIA AMBASCIATA D' ITALIA

Washington, D.C., January 16, 1909.

MY DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:

I am just now in receipt of a cable which advises me that the fund, which the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would provide for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the victims of the earthquake, under the management of Her Majesty Queen Helena, will be accepted with gratitude.

I cannot too highly appreciate this noble and most generous initiative, which you and your readers have taken, displaying thereby a remarkable intuition of the most urgent needs of those stricken multitudes.

With kindest regards, believe me,

Yours very sincerely,

E. MAYOR DES PLANCHES,

Royal Italian Ambassador.

This assurance from the Queen of Italy, who has won the undying love of all good women throughout the world by her self-sacrificing labors among the earthquake sufferers, will be welcomed by the generous-hearted mothers and daughters of America. Queen Helena, with her own hands, has ministered to the injured. She has clothed the naked, fed and sheltered the hungry and destitute. She knows, from actual personal contact, the great need of the thousands of women and children, who the Italian Ambassador declares are suffering more severely than any other class. These bereaved mothers, the widows and the orphans, are Queen Helena's special care.

The mothers, the daughters, the sisters and the wives who read The Christian Herald, and whose hearts are filled with sympathy for every good work, are invited to help noble Queen Helena in aiding the poor, stricken Italian mothers and the helpless little children. We would urge them to take up this phase of the work and make it specially their own. If such organizations as the D. A. R., W. C. T. U., Colonial Dames, Federation of Mothers, King's Daughters, Daughters of 1812, the Ladies' Aid Societies in our various churches and other women's organizations were to respond to the good Queen's cordial invitation, thousands of destitute Italian women and children would be lifted out of misery and despair and cheered and comforted by this great international kindness.

Send all Contributions for this purpose to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Italian Earthquake Relief Fund, 92 Bible House, New York.

Once Outcast, Now a Pastor

AS I sit on the porch of my parsonage and look backward, I cannot help feeling grateful to God, and to the Bowery Mission, that to-day, instead of being in a drunkard's grave, I am saved by grace and a preacher of the Gospel. In 1885 I came to the United States, with my bride of a few days, and went to live in Baltimore. The craving for strong drink was beginning to get possession of me—a habit I had learned while in the British army during the Zulu and Boer wars of 1879 and 1881. My wife, a noble Christian woman, did all she could to help reform me by her prayers and Christian influence. She died, however, before this was accomplished, leaving me with a child six months old. I went squarely up against the wall, and became an outcast. I tramped to New York, and began a terrible experience among the flotsam and jetsam of the under world, or "submerged tenth."

Rev. F. J. Bayliss and Mrs. Bayliss

I got work, but lost it through drink; sold my shoes from my feet and my coat from my back. I made resolutions and broke them; signed pledges and dishonored them; saw myself going downward to perdition, with no one to deliver.

On one of these nights—cold, footsore, hungry, tired and weary of life—I passed the door of the Bowery Mission. The old song, "I've Anchored My Soul in the Haven of Rest," attracted me. I went in, and there I found refuge and power to overcome. I found "the pearl of great price."

The superintendent, Mr. John Wyburn, became interested in me, and later I became cashier of the Mission restaurant, where were fed two or three thousand hungry men daily. It was my delight, after a day's work, to go to the Mission and tell the story of my redemption. I stayed there about eighteen months, and then went West with a band of other converts of the Mission. We marched across the country, preaching in the churches on the way, and often sleeping outdoors.

I next went with a companion into the mining camps of the Rockies, preaching the Gospel and telling the "old, old story." From there I received a call to a Methodist church in Chase County, Nebraska. I had practically the whole county for my parish, and God wonderfully blessed me in the salvation of souls and enabled me to build a little church on these Western prairies, with the help of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and Christian people of the East. From there I entered the evangelistic field, and have been wonderfully blessed, preaching the Gospel all over the country. I am a member of the North Illinois Conference, and pastor at Holder and Ellsworth, where I have been for four years. I have three churches, and the past year has been the best of all, showing about eighty-five conversions and some sixty additions to church membership. Last year we built a new $3,000 church at Holder.

Workers at Home and Abroad

—MISSIONARY ROCKWELL CLANCY, who did excellent service during the India famine, in connection with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relief work, goes home on sick furlough in February.

—A NUMBER of churches in and near Lafayette, Ind., are about to begin a simultaneous meeting campaign. Rev. Edgar L. Buchanan, of Hope Chapel, Lafayette, is at the head of the movement.

—A CHURCH building at Sion, near Berne, Switzerland, collapsed during service on January 10, burying the worshipers in its ruins and killing and injuring many. Over forty dead were taken from the debris.

—EVANGELIST SMILEY is leading the churches at Wray, Colo., in a revival campaign that has stirred the town. Crowds pack the court house to the doors at every service and ranchmen gather from twenty miles around.

—A MOST remarkable and fruitful revival has just closed at Doniphan, Neb. Evangelist Enslow, of Chicago, was in charge. A large majority of the converts were men. People for miles around attended the meetings.

—MLLE. MATILDE PRADELLA, a Christian teacher at Bucaramanga, Colombia, has begun a worthy work among the poor neglected native children of that place. She will gladly write to any one interested in aiding the spread of the Gospel there.

—A BEAUTIFUL MEMORIAL of the late Rev. Joseph Norwood, the well-known missionary teacher among the Spanish and Cuban residents of Tampa and Ybor City, Fla., was unveiled at the public school building, Tampa, lately. It was the gift of scholars and teachers.

—MRS. A. S. STEELE, founder of the Steele Orphanage, Chattanooga, Tenn., sends an account of the destruction by fire of the Orphanage Summer Home, at Summit, Tenn. The loss was $2,000. The fire was probably the work of an incendiary. It is a serious loss to the work.

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN, of Fairbury, Ill., have just completed their evangelistic work in Nebraska and Iowa. Over fifteen hundred professions occurred in their meetings. They are to conduct union tabernacle meetings with all the Methodist churches in the city of Binghamton, N. Y., during January.

—MISSIONARY ROBERT H. BENDER, San Salvador, C. A., writes: "Your welcome letter with check duly received. Sincere thanks to your readers. We need a native colporteur, at $10 a month. We are grateful for the publication of our letters, for it has got others interested in our work and the means sent have often come in a time of pressing need.

—TWO DAYS have been set aside for religious ceremonies and observances by the Hudson-Fulton Celebration Commission, in connection with the three hundredth anniversary of the discovery of the Hudson River by Henry Hudson, the English navigator, sailing under Dutch colors for the Dutch East India Company, and the one hundredth anniversary of the first successful steam navigation of the Hudson River by Robert Fulton.

—HOME MISSIONARY GUSTAVE BLOMGREN, of the Chicago Finnish Mission, writes: "Traveling about 10,000 miles, I have had the opportunity of preaching over 200 times in many different places, besides personal work and distributing books and tracts in large numbers. In Canada I have gone as far as Eelsville and Red Deer, in Alberta. Some of the Finns declared that they had not heard the Gospel in their own tongue for eight or ten years past. Many sinners have been led to accept Christ."

—MISSIONARY C. B. WARD, long identified with Methodist missions in India, died at his post in that country recently. He was converted in Chicago about 1873, and in 1876 was sent to India by Bishop William Taylor. He served in Bellary, Hyderabad, the Central Provinces and among the jungle tribes. He was a resolute, earnest worker, of unwearying diligence, and his labors among the natives were attended by remarkable results.

—THE MISSION YACHT ASSOCIATION, of New York, has had a most successful year. At Christmas the mission gave to sailors presents of Testaments, books, fruit, nuts and sweets, turkeys, undergarments, sweaters, comfort-bags, and many other useful and pleasing articles. About five thousand presents were provided. Dwellers on the canal boats also were remembered. On one boat there was not a crumb of bread. The mission left a Christmas tree for the children, a turkey for the family, with other good things. Captain Benn, the "Gospel skipper" of the yacht Messenger and the founder of the association, is a welcome figure among the seamen on incoming ships in New York Bay.

JOY WORK
And the Other Kind

Did you ever stand on a prominent corner at an early morning hour and watch the throngs of people on their way to work? Noting the number who were forcing themselves along because it meant their daily bread, and the others cheerfully and eagerly pursuing their way because of love of their work.

It it a fact that one's food has much to do with it. As an example:

If an engine has poor oil, or a boiler is fired with poor coal, a bad result is certain, isn't it?

Treating your stomach right is the keystone that sustains the arch of health's temple and you will find "Grape-Nuts" as a daily food is the most nourishing and beneficial you can use.

We have thousands of testimonials, real genuine little heart throbs, from people who simply tried Grape-Nuts out of curiosity—as a last resort—with the result that prompted the testimonial.

If you have never tried Grape-Nuts it's worth while to give it a fair, impartial trial. Remember there are millions eating Grape-Nuts every day—they know and we know if you will use Grape-Nuts every morning, your work is more likely to be joy-work, because you can keep well, and with the brain well nourished work is a joy. Read the "Road to Wellville" in every package—"There's a Reason."

A New Serial Story Written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

George Hunter and Dudley Verner were college chums and are stopping at the country home of the former, before George is about to start practice as a lawyer and Dudley as a physician. George is introduced to Miss Danforth, daughter of Squire Danforth, who lives on the fine estate called "Paradise." Dudley is most anxious to meet her. A village character, Jack Green, takes them to see "Paradise." He says that they do not often receive company, but spend much time in travel. They there meet Miss Danforth at the well, and Dudley is introduced. A thunder storm comes up and the young men are invited to take shelter in the house, where they stay to dinner. As they leave, the Squire drives by on the way home. His daughter is surprised at his sudden return. She explains why the young men had been there. He says he is particular about his visitors, and asks her not to do more than recognize them hereafter. He says that he is going abroad, and will take her and her aunt. They go to call on Mrs. Hunter and her niece, Miss Sanborn. The Squire discovers that Mrs. Hunter is an old friend. On his return he tells Aunt Phœbe a family secret, which greatly agitates her, but which she cannot tell Miss Danforth. Marian stays up until early in the morning, when the aunt falls asleep. That day Mr. Hunter and Mr. Verner call to wish them a pleasant voyage. Dudley Verner starts life as a doctor in a quiet neighborhood. The two friends save a little boy named Donald Fraser from being run over, and Dudley takes him home and brings George the next day to see him. Mrs. Fraser faints as George says, "Ellen, is it you?" A letter is received from Marian, who is in Scotland, telling of a visit to her mother's grave. Mrs. Fraser was George's aunt, who had run away to marry Captain Fraser, of whom her family disapproved. They lost track of her. George finds she has been badly treated and deserted. He plans to take her to his mother. Mrs. Fraser discovers that her husband still lives and again disappears. Squire Danforth finds a friend in an insane asylum who has information which may lift, his daughter writes, a cloud from his life.

CHAPTER X

GEORGE and his friend were warmly welcomed by Mrs. Hunter, who quickly asked, "Where are Ellen and her child? I have been longing to see them. Is she much changed, George?"

"Yes, mother, very much changed in some respects; and yet you would know her in a moment, I think, as I did. I could not bring them to-day, and after luncheon, and a quiet chat between you and your adopted son, I will tell you all that I can about Ellen and her child."

"Is he a pretty child, George? His mother was a beauty. I hope he is like her rather than his father."

"Yes, he is a beautiful child, and, as Dudley will tell you, more than ordinarily intelligent. About his looks you may rest satisfied, as he is a real Hunter, like his mother, and still more like my father."

She smiled delightedly at this, then relapsed for a time into silence. Looking up at last, she said, "Is she not anxious to see me, George? I do want to make her comfortable. She was always treated by us like a dear daughter. She was so much younger than your father that she seemed a mere child to us when she went away, and nearly broke our hearts. I never could understand why a young girl with such a home, and so dearly beloved, could take such a foolish step. Surely love blinded her eyes."

"Yes, mother, it must have been so. Come, Lily, I want to see your flowers while Dudley and mother have a chat."

As they wandered through the grounds, George told his cousin all about his aunt, dwelling fondly on his own remembrance of the young girl who was the idol of his boyish fancy and recalling the sad time when she so suddenly left them. All this had happened long before Lily had come to make her home with her aunt; and although when George sent the message that she had been found, Mrs. Hunter had told her niece about the young girl and the sorrow which her sudden departure had caused, yet George's description of her, which was much more vivid and detailed, touched Lily deeply, and she entered readily into his plan of advertising for her. She was, indeed, so earnest in the matter that she would, if George had encouraged her, have gone at once to New York and aided in the search for her; not reflecting that Ellen by this time might be far away from the place.

Dudley had prepared Mrs. Hunter somewhat for the revelation which George had to make, having spoken of Mrs. Fraser's removal; but when the whole truth was revealed to her, and she realized that Captain Fraser was alive, and his wife and child perhaps at his mercy once more, the shock to her nervous system was something pitiful to behold; and yet Dudley learned, through this scene, much of the physical condition of his new patient.

When the young men were alone, he told George that his mother's health was in a precarious condition, and that something must be done at once to relieve her mind from the strain of this new sorrow.

"Get her away from here, George, into new scenes and to an entire change of air. You tell me Mrs. Fraser's elopement took place when you were all residents of New York, and that she knew nothing of your removal to this place. Therefore, of course, she has no clue to your whereabouts, as you did not give her your address. Now that I think of it, I gave her my card the day I took the child home, by way of introduction and assurance of my good faith, and if she has kept it, she may possibly communicate with me."

"Thank goodness! That is one load gone, Dudley. I have blamed myself over and over for not telling her just where I lived and giving her mother's address; but, of course, I could not foresee any such unlikely events as those which have happened. Still, I have faith to believe that we could not have found her, just to lose her again. Where will you suggest that I should take mother, Dudley?"

"Well, how would Long Branch or Manhattan Beach do—allowing her to decide between the two? You and I can go to see her there much oftener than we could come here, and, with your cousin and a trusty servant, she can be made comfortable. Then in the event of our hearing anything of Mrs. Fraser we can all be with her on short notice. You once spoke of an old nurse of yours who is still in the family. Would she be reliable?"

"Elsie is just the person—fond of mother and very faithful. She was a confidant of my father and mother during the sorrowful time when Aunt Ellen had just left us. Her going away nearly broke poor Elsie's heart, for she was very fond of her. She is thoroughly trusted and respected by my mother. Thank you, Dudley, for the suggestion."

The family party were later gathered on the cool veranda, and Mrs. Hunter spoke of the weakness and languor always felt during the hot August days. This gave George a good opportunity to propose that she should try a change of air. She at once objected, saying that she could not bear the fatigue of travel, but Dudley so warmly recommended the scheme, and made such sensible suggestions in regard to the easiest, most comfortable way of traveling, that she at length yielded.

She was delighted to think that with Lily and the faithful Elsie always beside her, and the "two boys," as she called them, able to come to her often, she would, at the same time, enjoy the health-giving breezes of old ocean and be lulled to sleep by the music of its waves.

After it had been decided that they should go, and Mrs. Hunter had chosen Long Branch as the most desirable place, preparations were at once begun for the journey, and the invalid was the most interested person of all, in making plans and arrangements.

Dudley returned to his work in New York, while George remained behind to accompany the little party to their journey's end. He had gone to the village postoffice one afternoon, and was walking leisurely in the direction of home, when he was overtaken and accosted by a stranger, rather uncouth in appearance, but with the kindliest of smiles beaming from his countenance.

"I reckon you don't know me now, do you?" he said.

George looked amazed for a moment. Then he recalled the visit to Squire Danforth's grounds, and the guide who had volunteered to secure them an entrance there.

"Yes," he replied, "I do know you now. You are Mr. Green, are you not?"

"Yes, I am Jack Green, at your service, sir."

"How are you and your family prospering, Mr. Green?"

"Wal, just tolerable, sir; times are pretty hard now, and it takes a sight to keep a family a-going. I miss the old Squire and Miss Marian. They were mighty good to Betsy and me—and many an odd job of work I got about the house. I wonder when be they coming home?"

"I cannot tell you that, but my mother and my cousin hear from them occasionally, and they are having a pleasant time. I rather think they will be home before winter sets in."

"I hope so," said Jack, musingly. "I say, stranger, is your name Hunter?"

"Yes."

"Well, Mr. Hunter, you was mighty good to me the day I took you to see the Squire's place. My services wa'n't worth half o' what you give me—and I'd like to do something for you if I can."

"Don't speak of it, Mr. Green. You had been very kind to us and it was only right you should be paid for your time. If I ever need your help, I will be glad to call on you again."

"Well, now, p'rhaps I can do somethin' for you sooner than you think." Whereupon Jack began at once to tell the real object which he had in view.

To his dismay, George learned that a man calling himself Captain Fraser had come to Branksome that morning, and had been making inquiry as to whether a family by the name of Hunter lived there. He said he had lost his wife and child; that they thought he had been killed, though he had only been seriously wounded and had lain for a long time in the hospital. He had gone to a relative of his wife, with whom she had made her home previous to her marriage, and found that the man, whose name was Hunter, had died, and his widow and son had removed to a place in the neighborhood of Branksome.

Jack, with his usual ability to learn everybody's business, overheard the conversation between the captain and the clerk at the hotel, and, at the sacrifice of his dinner, waited until he discovered that after a hearty meal the captain had gone to bed, telling the clerk not to wake him before five o'clock, as he was tired and needed a long sleep after traveling all night; but that as soon after that hour as possible he wanted a carriage and some one to drive him to the Hunter mansion.

George lost no time. As soon as they had reached his home, whither they had been walking at a rapid rate, he asked Elsie to see that Jack had a good substantial meal. Then, leaving him to enjoy it at his leisure, he went in search of his cousin, told her his story and besought her aid.

He was anxious that, if possible without alarming his mother, they should at once make their final preparations and start for New York that same night.

He told Lily and the faithful Elsie, both in strict confidence, everything that he had learned from Jack, and urged haste in their preparations.

Ordering a carriage, he hastily wrote a telegram to Dudley, giving him news of their intended departure and requesting him to meet them.

Jack sauntered into the hotel and offered his services to drive the stranger out to Mrs. Hunter's, saying that he had heard the man give the order, and as times were hard (this was always Jack's plea for work), he would like to earn a little money.

Jack's offer was accepted, and he started out, ostensibly to drive the stranger directly to Mrs. Hunter's home, but in reality (as he had been instructed), to drive him slowly and by a roundabout way, so that they should reach the desired place after the party had left.

As he drove leisurely along, he discoursed volubly on the beauty of the surrounding country, and asked the stranger if he'd ever been thereabouts before.

He replied with an oath and a command to drive faster.

Just as Jack calculated that the train had arrived at the station, he cracked his whip and, with a flourish, drove through the gates and up to the door of the handsome dwelling.

A maid answered Captain Fraser's loud ring at the bell, and told him that he could not see Mrs. Hunter, as she had just gone to the station to take the evening train for New York.

He turned angrily aside and reentered the carriage, ordering Jack with authority to drive "like Jehu," as he must catch the train for New York.

Jack, feeling secure in the knowledge that the train was steaming on its way, several miles from Branksome, went at a furious rate of speed down through the entrance gate, along the main street in the village, and drew up at the station. Jumping out quickly, the wrathful captain went into the waiting-room, and, finding only two or three loungers there, asked the clerk when the evening train would leave for New York.

When told that it had been gone just fifteen minutes, he rushed out and ordered Jack, in loud and angry tones, to take him back to the hotel.

Having deposited him there, Jack walked away, soliloquizing thus with himself: "Wal, that is about the best piece of work I've done for a long time. If I hadn't got a red cent for my pains, I'd feel paid ten times over in bein' able to help that young chap and fool this old sinner."

The Penalty of Falsehood*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"THE New Paradise" was the Church founded by Jesus Christ, the members of which "were of one heart and one soul, and not one of them said that aught of the things which he possessed was his own." One of the rich men of their number was Joses, who was usually called Barnabas (son of consolation), because of his many kindnesses to the sick and sorrowing. Barnabas owned a field, and sold it, and turned the price of it into the church treasury for the common good. This was added occasion for the sounding of his praises. We may be quite sure that Barnabas was not, therefore, lifted up in spirit and proud, for he became the companion of the apostle Paul in some of his missionary tours, and afterward went on an independent missionary tour. But Barnabas was not the only one to give up his property; for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them and laid the price at the apostles' feet.

Ananias and Sapphira decided to sell their property. They were intending to put the price of it into the common lot. But it was just then that temptation entered, and they decided to hold back a part of the price. They had no right to retain a portion of their property, having determined upon giving it to the Church. Sapphira remained at home while Ananias went to the apostles to bestow the gift. But the whole situation was known to Peter as soon as the gift was placed before him, and he asked the question, "Why hath Satan filled thy heart to lie?" And Peter showed him not only the wickedness but the foolishness of his act, for Ananias had not been forced to give away all of his property; he might have retained any part of it, if he had but told the truth about it. He had lied to God in his heart, before he had lied with his lips to Peter. God's punishment was swift and sure; for immediately he fell dead, and was carried out and buried. There were no mourners; only a few horror-stricken spectators.

No one carried word to Sapphira of the catastrophe; and after three hours of anxious waiting she came to find the reason for the delay in her husband's return. She seemed to be alone, but Satan accompanied her. When she came into the presence of Peter, he asked her: "Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much." And she said: "Yea, for so much," and fell down dead as her husband had done; and they carried her out and buried her—two liars in one grave! Still there were no mourners—only horror-stricken spectators. Shall we blame Ananias and Sapphira, since it was Satan who tempted them? There is no sin in being tempted. Jesus himself was tempted of the devil; was in all points tempted as we are. He made the devil leave him. So might Ananias and Sapphira have done. They were to blame for yielding to temptation.

Modern Ananiases

Dr. Joseph Parker has said: "Do not regard Ananias as a liar eighteen or nineteen hundred years old; Ananias is the liar of to-day. He represents those who say they have done all they can do when they know that their statement is a lie. No man has done all he can do. Are we then all guilty before God in that respect? Certainly not. If a man will honestly say to God: 'There are twelve hours in the day and I cannot profess to give thee more than two of them,' that man is an honest man, and the two hours may be acceptable. But if a man shall endeavor to represent his two hours as twelve, he will die; he will be buried, but not in 'the sepulchre of the kings.' Which of us has done all he can? Not I. I could have done ten times more. I could have prayed more, preached more, and suffered more. What they can say who have done nothing but enjoy themselves I know not."

A Lie is a Lie

Call things by their right names. A colored brother recently, in contradicting what another colored brother had stated, said: "Brother Moderator, that is a matter of wrongfulness of statement." It is not well to attempt to gloss over a lie in that way.

It has been said that adjectives and adverbs are responsible for the growth of lies. Some one has said that the

To Our Fair Competitors

You housewives who bake your own beans are about our only competitors. Those who buy ready-baked beans naturally choose Van Camp's. So let us discuss home baking.

First, think of the trouble, the time and the fuel. Think how convenient it is to have Van Camp's in the house, ready for instant serving.

Then the digestibility. Your beans are heavy food. They ferment and form gas. For, in a dry oven, you can't apply enough heat.

We bake in live steam—in ovens heated to 245 degrees. We bake in small parcels, so the full heat goes through. Van Camp's beans digest; they don't form gas. You get the whole of their food value.

Then the goodness. Van Camp's beans are mealy, nutty and whole. Steam baking breaks no skins. And Van Camp's are baked with the tomato sauce, so we get a delicious blend.

Thus we give you beans that are better than home-baked, and beans that are better for you.

Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS

Here is Nature's choicest food—84% nutriment. You can't afford to spoil it.

Here is a dish with the food value of meat, at a third the cost of meat. Surely you want your people to like it, and to eat it often.

Here are meals always ready—always fresh and savory.

Please compare your beans with Van Camp's. See which your people like best. See which best digest. After a test you'll never bake beans at home.

Three sizes: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can.

pert miss, and cultured lady, and dignified matron, to say nothing of the college boy, pick up the most forcible adjectives in the vocabulary and hurl them at you without the least provocation. If anything is agreeable, they call it "perfectly charming." If anything is good they call it "simply divine." If anything is distasteful it is "awfully mean" or "rotten," or "too horrid for anything." They are often "frightened to death," or "half dead," or "they thought they would die." It is hardly a step from such expressions as these to lies. It is the surest way of working up a lying habit. It has been suggested that it would not be a bad idea to devote a little of the time now given to correct pronunciation to acquiring the proper use of adjectives, so that speech may become the vehicle for expressing concise thought, instead of forming as it does the method of delivering one's self of commonplace utterances, vague, tiresome and meaningless, utterly destructive as the practice is of careful thought. Do not say that a sermon was "perfectly splendid," or "beautiful," or "lovely," but rather that it was thoughtful, convincing, eloquent. This sort of discrimination would be to erect a barrier against untruthfulness. A young minister was cured of the use of extravagant language after he had been denouncing a person in terrible fashion, by an aged man, who took him aside and said: "Young man, if you had to describe twelve wicked men, beginning with the best of the lot, you would use up the entire English language before you got through with six, and you could do nothing with the second half but make faces." The young minister saw the point.

Untruths in Business

The Quaker who listened to the stories of a dry-goods clerk about the material he was pressing for sale, put the whole case in a nutshell when he said: "It is a great pity, friend, that lying is a sin, since it seems so necessary in thy business." But is it "necessary"? We believe there are many successful business men who have for their motto, "Honesty is the best policy," even if they do not have it printed on a placard and hung up in their stores. It is hung up on the walls of their memories, and that is better still. We cannot help thinking that the lie which Ananias and Sapphira told about their deal in real estate was not the first lie they had ever told, else they could not have been so barefaced, so persistent about it, nor would their punishment have been so summarily given. We would therefore look upon it as the culmination of a lying career, rather than the beginning of it. But from either point of view it should be a warning to all, and so God has put the story into his Book as an example of ungodliness. It is safe to say there was no more lying in that vicinity for many a day and the incident has checked lying the world around.

The Wickedness of a Lie

A little girl came to her mother with the question, "Which is worse, to tell a lie or to steal?" The mother replied that she really could not say which was the worst. The child replied, "I've been thinking a good deal about it, and I think it is worse to lie than to steal, because, if you steal something, you can take it back, unless you have eaten it; and if you have eaten it, you can pay for it. But a lie is forever."

The word "but," with which the fifth chapter of Acts begins, opens up the vista of the wickedness of a lie. Before their act all had been harmonious and sweet in the Church. How a lie changed it all! And the reputation of the Church was trailed in the dust. It has been said that "Ananias and Sapphira (and their successors) can do more mischief in the Church than all the atheists that ever declared the heavens to be untenanted space." Outsiders cannot injure the Church; they have been trying many centuries to do it, and have accomplished nothing. But deadly influence has been felt from those of the "household," the members of the Church, who utter unkind speech, and do mean things, and tell lies. These have done more harm than all of the atheistic publications ever issued.

"I see," said an opposing counsel to the late Emery A. Storrs, "you hate to meet the truth in this matter." "I never do meet it," was the prompt reply; "truth and I always travel in the same direction."

Acted Lies

Ananias acted a lie when he laid the money at the feet of the apostles; his whole manner said, "It is all." Although it is not recorded, Peter probably asked him if it was all. If so, then Ananias spoke a lie as well as acted a lie. But lying will out. A story is told of a boy whose mother gave him a basket of popcorn to plant. After planting a number of rows under a broiling sun, he could not see that the grains had sensibly lessened in number and the task seemed to be endless. He dug a hole, dumped the remainder into it, and told his mother that he had planted all the corn. She doubted and said, "Jake, if you have told me a lie that corn will tell on you." The weather was seasonable and sun and showers soon brought up the corn. She marched him into the field and showed him the thick stalks that had shot up from his wholesale planting. The truthful grains had told on him.

President McKinley said: "The truth cannot be burned, beheaded, or crucified. A lie on the throne is a lie still, and truth in a dungeon is truth still; and the lie on the throne is on the way to defeat, and truth in the dungeon is on the way to victory.

The Abundant Life

mountain slopes and the stars, the homes of men and their souls! And that life, jubilant, full, appropriating, he gives, so that we, too, may see "earth crammed with heaven" and may see the faith, the truth, the eager hunger, the spiritual capacity threatened with overflow, the everlasting worth of the souls about us.

Now, the purpose of Jesus must be the ambition of his followers. We, too, must be gracious and generous in our plans for people. We must never damage any life, never rob it, never wound it, never restrict it, never dwarf it or cramp it. It is our business to protect life, to encourage it, feed it, crowd it with good, expand it, exalt it. The Church is to be supremely interested in the things of life —the sanctity of home, reckless divorces, gambling, drunkenness, trade, labor, poverty, pain, ignorance—all the forms of vice and all the forces of righteousness. This is our supreme business if we are to adopt the programme of Jesus. We are to humanize life, socialize it, Christianize it, relieve its distresses, release its energies, take away the things that cripple it, loose it and let it go.

Have we this life? If we have, we are in possession of a proof of God which is invulnerable to the assaults of logic.

'Tis life of which our nerves are scant;
More life, and fuller, that we want.

Jesus gives it. The basis of it lies "beneath the probe of chemic test." It is hid with Christ in God. And its distant summits are beyond the reach of astronomical flights. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be."

GLASSES UNNECESSARY

Eye Strain Relieved by Quitting Coffee

Many cases of defective vision are caused by the habitual use of coffee.

It is said that in Arabia where coffee is used in large quantities, many lose their eyesight at about fifty.

A N. J. woman writes to the point concerning eye trouble and coffee. She says:

"My son was for years troubled with his eyes. He tried several kinds of glasses without relief. The optician said there was a defect in his eyes which was hard to reach.

"He used to drink coffee, as we all did, and finally quit it and began to use Postum. That was three years ago, he has not had to wear glasses and has had no trouble with his eyes since.

"I was always fond of tea and coffee and finally became so nervous I could hardly sit long enough to eat a meal. My heart was in such a condition I thought I might die any time.

"Medicine did not give me any relief and I was almost desperate. It was about this time we decided to quit coffee and use Postum, and have used it ever since. I am in perfect health. No trouble now with my heart and never felt better in my life.

"Postum has been a great blessing to us all, particularly to my son and myself."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

✳ Young People's Societies ✳

World-Wide Endeavor*

THE unifying of the world of believers is one of the greatest objects to which Christians can now address themselves. It is said that the separation of Protestants into sects, although deplored by some commentators, has really been a blessing; that doubtful theological points have thereby been cleared, and the general field of religious thought more thoroughly examined and tested than would have been possible without such minute subdivision.

But the time for the sifting and arguing of merely academic questions of doctrine is long past. The walls of sect are falling all around us, and the wonderful Christian Endeavor movement has been one of the most efficient agencies to this end. Every member of that great society should feel his responsibility and privilege in this matter and should bless God daily that he has been one unit in the vast army which is helping to gather together the whole Christian world under the banner on which is inscribed alone: "We follow Jesus, given of God to save the world from sin."

In the language of the philosopher, this is the coming "rational ethical democracy," whither all our present social unrest tends; and this, as President King reminds us, is hardly other than "the civilization of brotherly men of the kingdom of God."

To this civilization each sect and each nation contributes its own especial, distinctive strength, thus braiding a cable of otherwise unattainable power. George Matheson tells us of the "great orchestra" which sings the praises of God, and in which the whole world has taken part. He says, in an eloquent apostrophe: "India has soared for thee, Persia has fought for thee, Egypt has dreamed for thee. Thou hast given to Greece her music for the grove, and to Rome her music for the battle, and to Egypt her music for the funeral march of time, and thou hast added one strain more—the strain of Israel, the simple song, 'Be just, be good, be true'—a music for the market place, a chord for the commonplace, a warbling for the worker, a hymn for household burdens, a song for domestic service."

And it is this great chorus of praise which is ascending to-day from the whole world, "all the earth making a joyful noise unto the Lord"; and the beautiful bond of the Christian Endeavor Union is one of the great influences which is helping to inspire and harmonize this universal pæan.

It goes without saying that the foundation principle of this mighty union must be love—the universal love of God for his creatures. The Jews were angry when Paul told them that God was not the God of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles; and still more, when, in proof of his belief in this offensive doctrine, he directed the best of his efforts toward the salvation of the vast provinces lying without the limits of Judaism.

"The world," says Mr. Moody in his wonderful sermon on "Love," "does not understand theology nor dogma, but it understands love and sympathy."

Thus Drummond tells of the great power of Livingstone over the ignorant blacks of Africa. They could not understand a word that he uttered, but he gave them gifts, he healed their sick, he ministered to their needs; and the universal language of love and sympathy appealed to their souls.

The widespread fellowship of the Christian Endeavor Society rests upon this idea of a love which makes all men brothers—a love which renders service easy, charity beautiful and selfishness impossible.

*Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, February 7 (Christian Endeavor Day). Text—Ps. 98 : 1-9.

Our Messiah*

COMMENTATORS upon the Scriptures tell us over and over again that the transcendent proof of their authenticity is the consistency preserved throughout their entire course regarding the coming and the character of the Messiah. Many centuries before he appeared, before there was anything, as men count evidence, to prove that he was coming, prophets and poets were foretelling his advent and chanting praises to his glory. Even Moses had said that he was coming, and that he was to be a prophet. He was to be God's own Son and his interpreter and to make plain his will to men as no Old Testament seer had ever done.

Moses said also that the very words of God should be in his mouth; and this truly came to pass.

That the learned Jews did not credit the clear and detailed Messianic descriptions from the lips of Isaiah was demonstrated by their failure to receive Christ, though he fulfilled all of the great prophet's words. He had no form nor comeliness. He was despised and rejected. He was wounded with many stripes. He was oppressed and afflicted. He was taken from prison and from judgment, and was numbered with the transgressors.

Yet, after all this, the Sanhedrin expected a glorious king to appear, with armies of angels to enforce his claims. They clamored, as men have ever done, for the outward symbols of royalty. The Messiah showed us how valueless these are, and how the seat of all power and glory and beauty lies forever in the soul—a reflection of the Divine soul.

Frederick W. Faber, the gifted hymn writer, pictures to us the earth as it would have been if Jesus had never come. He draws the terrors of the day of judgment, as men have often portrayed them, and adds, "The misery and confusion of earth upon that day will have less of real horror in it than the earth without Jesus would have, even though the sun were shining and the birds singing. Without hope or happiness, without love or peace, the past a burden, the present a weariness, the future a shapeless terror; such would the earth be if there were no Jesus."

The way in which the Messianic thought, like a golden thread, has run through history, has been described, in another connection, by one of our poets. He sings the grandeurs of art—its wonderful temples, its pyramids, its statues; and adds that the same power which devised them, forms also the wood-bird's nest, and teaches the fish to paint its shell, and the pine tree to renew its leaves; and also, through the hands of men, built > those holy piles,

> While love and terror laid the tiles: . . .
> . . . the same power that reared the shrine
> Bestrode the tribes that knelt within.
> Ever the fiery Pentecost
> Girds with one flame the countless host.
> The word unto the prophet spoken
> Was writ on tables yet unbroken;
> The word by seers or sibyls told.
> In groves of oak, or fanes of gold,
> Still floats upon the morning wind,
> Still whispers to the willing mind.
> One accent of the Holy Ghost
> The heedless world hath never lost.

No, nor ever will; and it is the tracing of the Messiah thought through the various books of the Bible—composed, remember, in different ages, in countries widely separated, and often without a knowledge by the authors of each other's writings—which has converted many infidels to Christianity, and which forms an impregnable bulwark for our religion.

THE TEST OF APOSTLESHIP

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE assembly which sat in council as to the method of dealing with Peter and John had come to the determination to threaten these disciples "that they speak henceforth to no man in this name." But the men they threatened were standing, at that very time, in the presence of God; God the Holy Ghost was dwelling in them, Jesus was with them always, and especially now in the time of their need. Peter had been the chief spokesman, but now, it seems, John spoke with equal boldness.

When once a course is clear, we can speak with God's authority about it, though all men should be against us. There are some who would subvert all ecclesiastical authority and uproot all existing churches; but this spirit is, most surely, not of God; better to remain as God's light and God's salt where we are until he undertakes for us. But when men attempt to hinder the work of the Spirit of God who calls men, women or children to win souls, then we may appeal to God's authority, for he has called every converted soul to be a witness for him, and a winner of other souls. And to such as would hinder them we have one answer, and that is the answer of Peter and John. It is the instinct of every truly converted soul to testify of what God has done for him; he cannot help it—it flows out unbidden. "We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard."

The rulers "further threatened them," but they could do no more; the mass of the people "glorified God for that which was done," and thus they could not punish them. The people had no personal interest at stake, the priests had a great deal; it had never been known that one of their number had made a man to walk who had been born lame and had continued so for forty years, and if such manifestations continued, the people would all discover that the power of God was with Christ's disciples and not with the priests. This would be fatal to their authority; so, at any cost, they must put it down.

Peter and John left the council, and related to their own company all which the chief priests and elders had said unto them. How would men filled with the Holy Ghost act under such circumstances? Would they talk it over, reflect upon the want of spirituality among the priests, and take advantage of the occasion to magnify themselves at their expense? This would be the way of the world; but these were "not of the world," even as Christ was "not of the world" (John 16:14, 16). No! "they lifted up their voice to God with one accord," and strengthened themselves in God. They prayed as though they themselves were not concerned; practically denying or ignoring themselves, they saw the people rising up against "Thy holy Child Jesus, whom Thou hast anointed . . . for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done."

Oh, glorious independence of man, glorious freedom from circumstances which comes of taking all things from God, and seeing his hand in all! Here is a specimen of a Holy-Ghost-made prayer. They do not pray, "Behold their threatenings, and keep us in safety"; themselves were lost and forgotten; they lived but for the commission which had been given them. Seeing how this healing had been used in awakening hundreds, they thirsted for boldness in speaking of Jesus, which should be warranted, as their Lord had promised, by "signs following" them that believed. "When they had prayed, the place was shaken where they were assembled together; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they spake the Word of God with boldness." There was no cowardice, no shrinking from that which had brought them into trouble; it was springtide in the Church then; self seemed to be non-existent; all was seen in the light of God and immortal souls.

FORTY-SEVENTH STAR IN THE FLAG

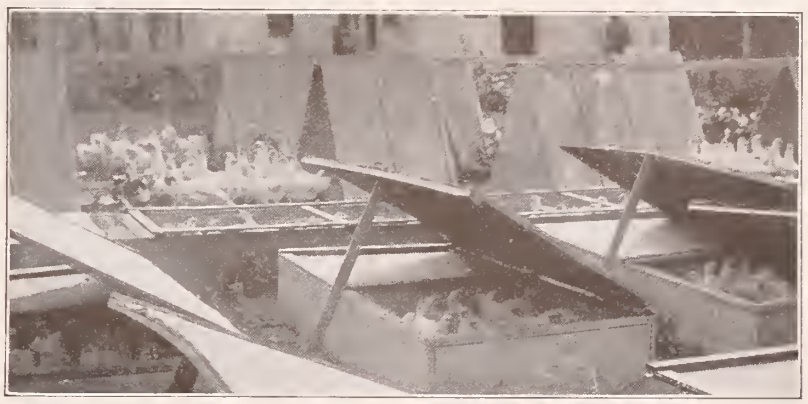
Tent Colony for Consumptives, Santa Fe, New Mexico

varies from 2,800 feet in the southern part of the Territory to 8,000 feet in the north. One can, therefore, pick out a climate to suit, so far as temperature is concerned, and feel secure in the knowledge that he will be exposed to no violent variations, either to extreme heat in summer or extreme cold in winter. For sufferers from throat, bronchial and lung troubles, the "Sunshine Territory" possesses peculiar advantages. The government has established a great sanitarium for the treatment of tuberculosis at Fort Bayard (near Silver City), and another at Fort Stanton. At Las Vegas the Associated Fraternities of the United States have established the Fraternal Sanitarium, and one of similar character is being built by the Presbyterian Church at Albuquerque, while private sanitaria are maintained at Santa Fé, Albuquerque, Las Vegas, Silver City, Las Cruces and other places.

Santa Fé, the capital city, possesses a greater number and variety of historic monuments and memorials than the capital of any other American commonwealth. Nowhere can the student of history and archæology, the lover of nature, the observer of men and the mere sightseer find a greater variety of interests adapted to their several tastes. John L. Cowen.

A Living from Poultry on a City Lot

$1,500 in 10 Months from 60 Hens on a Corner of a City Lot



TO THE average poultryman that would seem impossible, and when we tell you that we have actually done a $1,500 Poultry business with 60 hens on a corner in the city garden 40 feet wide by 40 feet long, we are simply stating facts. It would not be possible to get such returns by any one of the systems of poultry keeping recommended and practiced by the American people, still it is an easy matter when the new PHILO SYSTEM is adopted.

Two Pound Broilers in Eight Weeks
are raised in a space of less than a square foot to the broiler, without any loss, and the broilers are of the very best quality, bringing here three cents per pound above the highest market price.

Our Six Months Old Pullets Are Laying at the Rate of 24 Eggs Each Per Month in a space of two square feet for each bird. No green cut bone of any description is fed, and the food used is inexpensive as compared with food others are using.

Our new book, the Philo System of Progressive Poultry Keeping, gives full particulars regarding these wonderful discoveries with simple, easy to understand directions that are right to the point, and 15 pages of illustrations showing all branches of the work from start to finish.

Don't Let the Chicks Die in the Shell
One of our secrets of success is to save all the chickens that are fully developed at hatching time, whether they can crack the shell or not. It is a simple trick, and believed to be the secret of the Ancient Egyptians and Chinese which enabled them to sell the chicks at 10 cents a dozen.

Chicken Feed at 15 Cents a Bushel
Our book tells how to make the best green food with but little trouble, and have a good supply any day in the year, winter or summer. It is just as impossible to get a large egg yield without green food as it is to keep a cow without hay or fodder.

Our New Brooder Saves Two Cents on Each Chicken
No lamp required. No danger of chilling, overheating, or burning up the chickens as with brooders using lamps or any kind of fire. They also keep all lice off the chickens automatically, or kill any that may be on when placed in the brooder. Our book gives full plans and the right to make and use them. One can be easily made in an hour at a cost of 25 to 50 cents.

The Philo System Is Unlike All Other Ways of Keeping Poultry and in many respects is just the reverse, accomplishing things in poultry work that have always been considered impossible, and getting unheard of results that are hard to believe without seeing; however, the facts remain the same, and we can prove to you every word of the above statement.

The New System Covers All Branches of the Work Necessary for Success
from selecting the breeders to marketing the product. It tells how to get eggs that will hatch, how to hatch nearly every egg, and how to raise nearly all the chicks hatched. It gives complete plans in detail how to make everything necessary to run the business, and at less than half the cost required to handle the poultry business in any other manner. There is nothing complicated about the work; any man or woman that can handle a saw and hammer can do the work.

A FEW TESTIMONIALS

Valley Falls, N. Y., Sept. 5, 1907.
It was my privilege to spend a week in Elmira during August, during which time I saw the practical working of the Philo System of Keeping Poultry, and was surprised at the results, accomplished in a small corner of a city yard. "Seeing is believing," they say, and if I had not seen it would have been hard to believe that such results could have followed so small an outlay of time, space, and money. (Rev.) W. W. Cox.

Oct. 22, 1908.
P. S.—A year's observation, and some experience of my own, confirm me in what I wrote Sept. 5, 1907. The System has been tried so long and by so many that there can be no doubt as to its worth and adaptability. It is especially valuable to parties having but a small place for chickens; seven feet square is plenty for a flock of seven. (Rev.) W. W. Cox.

Ransomville, N. Y., Dec. 5, 1908.
Dear Sir:—Last spring we purchased your book, entitled "Philo System," and used your heatless brooders last spring and summer. The same has been a great help to us in raising chix in the health and mortality. The chix being stronger and healthier than those raised in the brooders with supplied heat. We believe that this brooder is the best thing out yet for rasing chix successfully. We put 25,000 chix through your heatless brooders this last season, and expect to use it more completely this coming season. We have had some of the most noted poultrymen from all over the U. S here; also a large amount of visitors who come daily to our plant, and without any exception, they pronounce our stock the finest and healthiest they had seen anywhere this year. W. R. Curtiss & Co.

Skaneateles, N. Y., May 5, 1908.
One article of the Philo System entitled, "A Trick of the Trade," has been worth three times the amount the book cost. I saved on my last batch fifty chicks, which are doing nicely. W. B. Rease.

THE PRESIDENT'S CHILD-LABOR CONFERENCE

DURING the present month, a movement of more than ordinary humanitarian significance is being launched in Washington. In the historic East Room of the White House a gathering, unique in character and potential in ability and influence, has been summoned by President Roosevelt as a Child-Labor Conference. Primarily, this gathering of philanthropists, educators, charity workers, and others enlisted in the cause of the common good, was scheduled to take up the problem of the care and training of the orphan children of America—a juvenile army that now numbers more than 100,000 souls—but it will also give consideration to the larger topic of the conditions confronting and the influences affecting child workers generally throughout the whole of the United States.

Ernest P. Bicknell

Booker T. Washington

President Roosevelt himself called this meeting, as he had become painfully impressed by the manner in which dependent children are allowed to grow up in many sections of the country, without proper care or healthful surroundings. It was hoped that some measure might be formulated looking to an improvement in the treatment of the thousands of children in orphan asylums throughout the land, and also of benefit to those other thousands of children who, for any cause, are deprived of the training and discipline that are essential to child development. Settlement work, the operations of juvenile courts and other helpful agencies were also to be discussed. The line of investigation, it was expected, would lead to the deplorable conditions surrounding the child workers in many States—in the slums of our large cities, in the coal mines, the cotton mills of the South, and a dozen other industrial fields, all of which take heavy toll on juvenile life.

The President's invitation was issued in response to a letter which he received from a number of the most prominent philanthropic workers, calling attention to the advisability of an interchange of ideas on the child labor question and concerning unfortunate children generally. The signers of this appeal cited Mr. Roosevelt's message to Congress, which resulted in the establishment of a model juvenile court in the District of Columbia. The President, in his letter of invitation, said, by way of indorsement:

"Surely nothing ought to interest our people more than the care of the children who are destitute and neglected, but not delinquent. Personally, I very earnestly believe that the best way in which to care for dependent children is in the family home. In Massachusetts, many orphan asylums have been discontinued, and thousands of the children who formerly have gone to the orphan asylums are now kept in private homes, either on board, with payment from public or private treasuries, or in adopted homes provided by the generosity of foster parents."

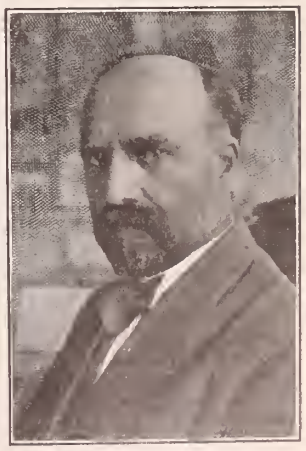
Among the workers of national prominence who are taking part in the conference are Jacob Riis, the New York social worker; Ernest P. Bicknell, who was president of the Charities and Correction Conference; Jane Addams, Chicago's famous settlement worker; Dr. E. E. Brown, Commissioner of Education; Booker T. Washington; Rabbi Hirsch, of Chicago; Herbert Parsons, of New York; Judge Lindsey, of Denver's famous juvenile court; Dr. Hastings H. Hart, of the Russell Sage Foundation; Herman A. Metz, Controller of New York City; Judge Julian W. Mack, president National Conference of Jewish Charities; Mrs. John M. Glenn and Miss Lillian D. Wald, of the National Child Labor Committee, and others.

The conference will probably indorse a movement for the establishment of a National Children's Bureau as a branch of the national government. This new governmental institution would regulate the collection and dissemination of information in regard to child-caring work.

Other questions for consideration are: whether or not the States of the Union should supervise the work of child-caring agencies, including both institutions and home-finding societies; also, whether the approval of State Boards of Charities should be necessary to the incorporation of child-caring agencies, and also whether the care of children by other than existing incorporated agencies should be prohibited.

Concerning the management of orphan asylums, there are two differing views. On the one hand are ranged the authorities, who contend that orphan asylums should be conducted in accordance with hard-and-fast rules, the inmates being subjected to discipline with military precision; and on the other are the champions of the more modern theory, which prescribes a life in "cottage communities" rather than in immense institutions, and which seeks to bring home comforts into the lives of orphans, to develop the individuality of the child. Still another problem is whether children who must be removed from their homes should be cared for in families or in institutions.

Jacob Riis



Dr. Elmer E. Brown

The outcome of the White House Conference may be some plan whereby child-caring and child-saving agencies can co-operate with each other and with other agencies for social betterment. It is hoped that the conference will result in the organization of some permanent committee for the purpose of carrying on an active propaganda to secure better laws in relation to children, better organization of child-caring agencies, and better aid to children generally.

A SERMON BY

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D.*

A LIFE MADE OVER

TEXT—Jeremiah 18: 4
"So he made it again"

AT THE time Jeremiah was called upon to prophesy, Jerusalem and the people of Israel were in a lamentable condition and seemed daily to be drifting farther and farther from God.

Jeremiah has been called the "Weeping Prophet," and he was well named, because he realized the sinfulness of sin and understood, as did no other man of his times, the awful condition into which Israel had drifted. He seems to be seeking in every possible way to turn them back again to Jehovah. Waking and sleeping, they are in his mind and on his heart, and all that he writes is in the nature of a plea that they should turn again to Him who waits to receive them with all the tenderness of a father and the pity of a mother.

One day he makes his way to the house of the potter, and at once he is interested in the work which is going on under the potter's direction. He sees him take a lump of clay, hold it for a moment in his hands, then place it carefully upon the wheel, and, as he turns the wheel quickly, with his deft fingers the potter fashions it into a vessel, which to the untrained eyes of the prophet seems to be perfect enough, but when the work appears to be finished the potter takes it in his hands and examines it with critical eye, and, as a shade of disappointment passes over his face, he crushes the vessel in his hands, places it upon the wheel once more and makes it over again.

The Divine Potter

There were but two lines of operation open to him in fashioning the vessel. One was to leave it in its imperfect condition, which was doubtless caused by some imperfection in the clay, but the vessel would then have been of the commoner sort; the other was to remove the obstruction to the working out of his plans and make a vessel which might have been used in the king's palace.

Jeremiah is most interested in this work, and at once his mind turns to Israel, and he exclaims, "Then the word of the Lord came to me, saying, O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the Lord. Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel."

This is an oft-used figure in the Bible, both in the Old Testament and in the New we find it. Isaiah uses it when he says, "But now, O Lord, thou art our father, we are the clay and thou our potter; and we all are the work of thy hand." And St. Paul makes use of the same figure when he exclaims, "Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor? What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction, and that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory?"

If this illustration is to apply to our experience, then we are the clay and God is the potter. If he is given the right of way in shaping our lives, they can but please him, and they must be beautiful in his sight. The clay is not attractive in itself, but when the hands of the potter touch it and the thought of the potter is brought to bear upon it and the plan of the potter is worked out in it and through it, then there is a real transformation.

The Sinner Regenerated

One day in the city of Venice, I went into a great Venetian glass storeroom. The finished work I saw there was superbly beautiful, but my friend by my side insisted that I go into the workroom, which seemed uninteresting enough until I beheld one of the glass blowers blowing upon the glass and saw it take shape as his mind influenced it and his will formed it, and, as I stood gazing upon him, as fine a bit of Venetian work as I have ever seen was in his hands. What the glass blower can do through the glass God can do in our lives, if we but give him an opportunity.

This is to me an illustration of regeneration. I was preaching in a New York village one evening, several years ago, when an old man, who for sixteen years had not been in the church, came to the service to hear "the singer sing." He was a hopeless and helpless drunkard, his children had forsaken him and his wife was dead. He was the first to lift his hand when I made the appeal and the first to go into the after-meeting as I gave the invitation. I saw him kneel; I heard him breathe out a prayer of penitence and confession, and watched him as he arose an absolutely changed man. I have known him for years, and he has never swerved from the path of duty and privilege open before the Christian. The man who was once despised is now respected, and the outcast of other days is the reputable citizen of to-day. This is but another illustration of the potter and the clay.

Out of Tune with Christ

On the day of our conversion we yielded to God, for men are converted when they say "I will" to him, and only then; and when we begin the Christian life we place ourselves in his hands and he is supposed to direct our every step; but the Christian experience of some of us has not been altogether satisfactory. There may have been some imperfections which have strangely influenced us—some secret sin which we would not give up. We may have had some controversy with Him regarding the following out of his plan for our lives, and thus the life which began so well is marred, the harmony seems to be gone and we are out of tune. We are Christians, but in experience we are joyless. We are likewise fruitless, and we are also shorn of power. We long to be holy, but know we are not. We desire to be pure in heart, but we are conscious of our weakness. We know the value of fellowship with Him, but we are still in bondage.

It is a comforting thing to know that with this consciousness of failure we are still in the potter's hands. If we do not yield to his will and let him make us over, we shall continue to be shorn of peace and power and blessing, and the vessel will be marred and unfit for the best use of the King, but we ought to learn the lesson from the potter and the clay, that God can make us over if we will but let him. God would and man would not is the secret of many a failure.

In crossing the continent to the Pacific coast at one time, I was urged to go by the Santa Fe Railroad and was ticketed in the special Limited Express. The journey was fine and the equipment was palatial, and all went well until we came to the desert; and then, although every ventilator was closed, every window shut and every blind drawn down to save us from the glare of the sun upon the sand, the journey was most trying.

A Plan for Every Life

Opposite my section sat a man who continually raised the blind and looked out the window. The porter quite as often drew the blind down. I went over to talk with him and complain of the journey and to say that I wished I had gone by the mountains. He looked at me as if I was bereft of reason and said, "This is the most wonderful trip in the world." I left him almost with disgust. My annoyance and discomfort all the time increased, and after a while, wearied more and more by the journey, I went back to talk with him again. Among other things, I asked him his business, and, as he threw up the window blind, he said, with a smile, "I am an irrigator; and that," said he, "is why the journey is wonderful, for if I could turn the water in on this desert I could make it blossom like the rose." I went back to my seat, having learned my lesson: that all that God required was to have the right of way in my life and turn the water in and the result would be victory.

God has a plan for every life. Jeremiah did not know what was in the mind of the potter, but we know what is in God's mind for us. "For whom he foreknew, he also foreordained to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren" (Rom. 8:29). And again: "Not that I have already obtained, or am already made perfect; but I press on, if so be that I may lay hold on that for which also I was laid hold on by Christ Jesus" (Phil. 3:12). And nothing less than this can satisfy God, and when we see him face to face we shall have joy in his presence just in the proportion as we have followed out his directions.

The years of man are the looms of God,
Let down from the place of the sun.
Wherein we are weaving always,
Till the mystic web is done.

And when the task is ended
And the web is turned and shown,
We shall hear the voice of the Master;
It shall say to us, "Well done."

So, if we have failed, God can make us over. He is still the potter and we are still the clay. He has many ways of making us over. Sometimes by outward circumstances like the potter's wheel, trials and disappointments, days when the sun does not shine and nights when the stars are dead; heartbreaking experiences and open graves before which we stand to place our best loved dead away. All these things are but the touch of the Master's hand and are intended to make our lives more as they should be.

I can quite understand the block of marble saying, "What does this blasting mean?" when the very foundations of the mountains seem to shake. And when it is on the railroad train, rumbling along to the busy city, I can scarcely wonder at its saying, "And what does this mean?" And still again, when the artist, with mallet and chisel, cuts away at it I can imagine it saying, "What can this mean? It is all past comprehension." But when the angel comes forth from the marble imprisonment, so perfect that if God would breathe upon it it would move its wings and fly to the angel choir, then I can hear the block of marble say, "I understand."

Lives Made Over for Service

Sometimes by his Word he makes us over. God's Word is a light, and it is in the light that flowers come to bloom and fragrance. God's Word is a hammer, and, in his loving hands, it is used to break away our imperfections. God's Word is a fire, and it burns and burns until there is reflected in us the image of Christ. God's Word is water, and water always cleanses by displacement. We have only to yield to him and the victory will be complete.

The Bible has accounts of many lives made over. In the Old Testament, we find Jacob, the supplanter, the cheat by name and also by nature; but when he is in the grip of the angel of the Lord, and the angel wrestles with him, he limps away from the angelic embrace and to power, and, instead of Jacob the Supplanter, he is Israel the Prince.

Elijah, in the same Old Testament, was a man of like passions with ourselves; but his passions, controlled, were like the very steeds to the chariot which came from heaven to be his escort into the heavenly city.

St. Paul, in the New Testament, bitter as a persecutor, thirsting for the blood of those who believed in the Nazarene, consenting to the death of St. Stephen and persecuting Christians unto strange cities, becomes as gentle as a woman and glories in the fact that he bears about on his body the marks of the Lord Jesus.

St. Peter, who was in other days a man of weakness, ignorance and failure, becomes the mighty preacher of the sermon on Pentecost and is the writer of his superb epistles, which scholars say are written in the purest Greek of the New Testament; and what God can do for Jacob and Elijah, St. Paul and St. Peter, he can do for you and do for me.

It is said that one night three men, overtaken by a storm in the Adirondacks, knocked at the door of a little hut and sought admission. There lived in this hut a man who had been disappointed in politics and love and embittered with the world; he had withdrawn from human associations and fellowship, and the three men who entered his hut received a scant welcome. When the evening meal was over, and they sat before the fire, one of the strangers noticed a violin on the shelf, which he wanted to play. The hermit at first declined to give him this privilege, but at last, being over-persuaded, he placed it in his hands and the stranger drew his bow across the strings, played "Home, Sweet Home," "America" and "Nearer, My God, to Thee." At the conclusion, the old hermit was sobbing. He took the old violin in his hands, replaced it on the shelf and said, "After this, I shall never play it again, for I am not

VANCOUVER'S SAVAGE RED TRIBES

A Native Indian Village

A Tribal Memorial

In a "Kayak" on the Sound

By SARA ENDICOTT OBER

NANAIMO, on the eastern coast of Vancouver Island, was the birthplace of Methodist missions on the British Columbian coast half a century ago. From there the Word spread to Victoria and along the inner coast, and later was carried by visiting Indians, the Tsimsheans, to Port Simpson on the confines of Alaska. Intrepid, zealous missionaries, Crosby, White, Evans, Tate, Nicholas and others, carried on the work with ardor, until now a line of Methodist missions dots the coast of British Columbia and the adjacent islands.

The wild west coast remained unreached for many years. It was inaccessible and dangerous, inhabited by the Ahts, a tribe of fierce, cruel, barbarous Indians. Cook, Vancouver and other early explorers all speak of them as such. Although the first settlement was established at Nootka, and both Spaniards and English attempted to civilize that part of the coast, the Indians remained in their old savage state. It was an Indian, Amos Cushing, who first carried the Gospel to the Ahts. He went over-land from Nanaimo to the head of Barclay Sound, where Alberni now stands, and preached the "joyful message" to the Shishahts.

The Ahts are so called because their various tribal names all end in these four letters. There are the Moatchahts at Nootka, the Kyuquoahts further north; then south come the Ahousahts, Clauoquahts, Kilsamoahts and Uchuklesahts along the coast to Barclay Sound, and the Shishahts at the head of it. Further south are the Pacheanahts and Nitinahts. These Indians were the terror of all shipwrecked mariners who were cast upon the cruel Vancouver reefs. Many a one has met death by torture at their hands, or lived in base servitude. Against the Indians of the opposite shores, near Cape Flattery, the Makahs and Quilleyutes, the Ahts gave battle, carrying their forays all along the Straits of Juan de Fuca and Puget Sound. Vancouver tells of ruined villages and of the bones of innumerable Indians strewing the shores. The Ahts took many captives, chiefly women and children, and enslaved them. I have met an old woman at Neah Bay who was once a slave, her kindred murdered by the west coast Indians. These slaves were subjected to cruel indignities, and hard, incessant labor. When a chief died, his slaves were killed and their bodies arranged about his burial place, so that their spirits should serve him in the life beyond the grave.

Now, the power of the Gospel is changing these savage lives, and creating new conditions. The Presbyterians established their mission and school at Alberni in 1892, and several out-missions in connection with it. These are at the mouth of Barclay Sound, at Dodge's Cove and Uchidlet. There is a large Industrial School and Mission at Ahousat, the most northern mission on the west coast. The Methodists established a mission at Clo-oose ("Safe Landing") in 1895, and another several years later at Clayoquot, where there is now a good hospital, that does grand work all along the coast.

The missionaries lead isolated lives, and endure many privations, but they have worked faithfully and well. It is very hard for the women and children connected with the missions, for they often see no white face for months and are shut away from the outer world and shut in with their often repulsive charges. To rightly understand the spiritual needs of these Indians one must know of their heathen beliefs and barbarous practices and the awful bondage in which they are to superstitious "medicine men" and "witch doctors." These have full control over them, and keep them in terror all their lives. When an Indian is sick, the "medicine man" is sent for, and his fee piled up in front of him before he begins to practice his arts. When the pile has reached the due proportions, he makes his diagnosis. Squatting by the sick one, he looks wise. He declares the trouble to be witchcraft, or the influence of some "spirit." If there is cold, or lung trouble, then an enemy has "thrown a coughing spirit into him." If rheumatic pains are apparent, then it is a "gnawing spirit, tearing at his vitals." Many times the diagnosis is that some small article has been "thrown into" the patient. This article the crafty doctor has concealed about him, or in some special hiding place—a bit of wood, bark, bone or stone, or a tiny insect or fish. Stripped to the skin, with a belt of rattling objects about his loins, the "medicine man" begins to dance and howl. Drums of skin are beaten, pieces of metal pounded, and kettles and hollow logs drummed upon, until there is a perfect bedlam of uncouth noises, to "drive out the evil spirit." A "strong medicine man" claims to be able even to raise the dead by his magic. The wild incantations go on for days, until the sick recover or die—more often the latter. Often the medicine man pounces upon the patient and manipulates the afflicted part of his body, kneading, pummeling and sucking at the flesh until he draws blood. This is an evidence that he is on the trail of the "evil spirit." When he thinks it time to complete the cure, he pretends to remove from the exhausted patient the "spirit thrown into him," and holds up to the view of his awe-struck admirers the bit of substance that he had claimed was the cause of the sickness. Then comes the "drowning of the spirit," as the "medicine man" plunges the object into a large vessel of water and makes a big commotion and splashing until the powerful spirit is finally subdued and killed. If the patient recovers then the doctor is indeed a "strong medicine man." If he dies, as is often the case, the "evil spirit," or witchcraft, was stronger than the doctor.

Even after the Ahts have accepted Christ the old superstitions have control over them. One old woman of Tsiquadra, feeling death near and wishing to save her relatives trouble, went to the cave where their dead were laid, and died there. Another of Clo-oose, being aged and blind, was carried to a cave and left there to die. The missionaries learned of it, and compelled the Indians to bring her back. They cared for her, and she became one of the converts, living eleven years after her strange experience.

The Ahts do not bury their dead, but place them on the ground, building small houses over them; in caves, or in the branches of high trees. They will never use anything belonging to one who is dead, but all the possessions are placed around the burial places or thrown into the sea. At the foot of a tree in which is deposited the body of an Ahousat chief are laid a large cabinet organ, and other articles of good furniture, while the tree is draped with blankets, webs of cloth, clothing, etc. Food is placed near the burial place for weeks, to satisfy the hunger of the departed spirit. The Clayoquots have an island on which is laid their dead, called "Dead Man's Island." It is covered with all kinds of articles of furniture, clothing, and other belongings of the dead. A young woman who had been educated at the Clo-oose Mission was drowned. She had a nice home, well furnished, and the best of clothing, bedding and comforts. Although she was a Christian, her heathen relatives burned the house and its contents, and threw her personal possessions—silver, china, jewelry, etc.—into the ocean.

Singular marriage customs prevail, the girls still being objects of barter, their price varying according to their tribal position, beauty, virtue or industry. The whole tribe joins in the negotiations, the groom's relatives camping before the home of the bride-to-be. They dance, scream, howl, sing and make a veritable pandemonium. They personate animals, with realistic bellowings, barkings and other noises. When the proper time comes, the parents of the girl yield their consent, and the whole tribe unite in feastings and revelry. The price of the bride is spent in providing the feast, and many a young couple have to slave for years to pay off the indebtedness incurred at the marriage. There are no marriage ceremonies, the man being simply received into the girl's family.

Christianity is bringing blessings and liberty to the women, as it always does in heathen nations. Schools and churches are taking the place of the ancient barbarous dances and rites. The young people especially are becoming civilized and adopting the new methods of domestic life and religious belief. It is only to one who seeks their soul's salvation, and strives to enter into their lives with the true desire to elevate them, that the Indians give their confidence. To the devoted missionaries has been given the highest privilege—that of beholding new-born souls struggling forth from the darkness of heathenism into the glorious light of the Gospel.

FIFTY MILLIONS WITHOUT CHRIST

FEW readers are aware perhaps that there is in this missionary age a district in North Central Africa "as large as the United States and far more densely populated" which is to-day untouched by any Christian missionary effort. In the Sudan proper, there are still 50,000,000 of people who know no more of Jesus Christ as Saviour of the world than if he had never come. A few missionaries of the Sudan United Mission and of the Church Missionary Society have in the past few years entered the western borderlands of this vast, untouched district. The United Presbyterians have planted one or two stations on the Upper Nile, in the east; but these are only solitary lighthouses, piercing the dense gloom of heathen darkness which stretches for fifteen hundred unbroken miles, from the most inland station on the west to the nearest lonely station in the east.

While Christians are hesitating to undertake the winning of the pagan peoples of that land for Christ, the Mohammedans threaten to fill the whole of that part of Africa with their fanatical teachings. Dr. Miller of the Church Missionary Society writes: "Christianity and Mohammedanism between them are spoiling paganism, and in less than fifty years will have divided the whole of West Africa." Dr. Zwemer, in speaking of the lands fast being occupied by Mohammedans (including the Sudan), says that they are the "strategical position" in the mission world of to-day. The leaders in mission circles have recently had their attention called to conditions there, through the efforts of Dr. H. Karl W. Kumm, of the Sudan United Mission; and the Committee on Reference and Counsel—which officially represents all of the Mission Boards of North America in questions where several boards are interested—recently sent a letter to the boards and societies of the United States and Canada inviting their co-operation in the evangelization of that great continental belt, and informing them of the character of the field and the work of Dr. Karl W. Kumm. Dr. Kumm left England on his way to the Sudan about three weeks ago with another party of missionaries. This brings the staff of the Sudan United Mission up to nineteen, including two married ladies now on the field.

PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

IN connection with the coming centennial of Lincoln's birth the reminiscences of those who knew him or saw him are of added interest. Captain Oliver C. Gatch, of Indiana, aided in carrying the dying Lincoln from Ford's Theatre after he was shot.

Captain Gatch was born March 1, 1836, at Milford, O., and is now living in "hale and hearty" old age on his farm in Aurora, Ind. Captain Gatch enlisted as a private in Company G of the Eighty-ninth Ohio—the famous heroic Eighty-ninth—that went into battle at Chickamauga numbering 700; after the battle only 150 responded at roll call. Gatch was taken prisoner, but finally made a dash for freedom.

Five weeks after his escape, he caught sight of the Second Ohio Heavy Artillery, at Leeper's Mills, and was taken to the headquarters of General Stoneman, then at Knoxville. He went to Washington with his brother, Dr. Charles Gatch. The Gatch brothers reached the capital on April 14, 1865. The rumor was in the city that President Lincoln and his wife and General Grant would be at Ford's Theatre that night, at the play of the "American Cousin." General Grant did not go, but the Gatch brothers did, and had seats so that they could plainly see the President's box. He saw Booth enter the President's box, and heard at once the pistol shot which disclosed the terrible errand of which he had not dreamed. Dr. Charles Gatch, surgeon, was the first physician to be at Lincoln's side. The two Gatch brothers and two others then lifted the President tenderly and removed him in their arms.

Ever since President Eliot, of Harvard University, announced his resignation, some months ago, there has been much interest as to who would be chosen as the new executive head of the institution. On January 30, the corporation elected as president Professor Abbott Lawrence Lowell, the distinguished writer, and, for the last few years, professor of government. When he appeared before his first class on the next day, a class number-ing several hundred, the students rose as one man and cheered.

Professor Lowell is eminently fitted for the high position he has been called to fill. He is a lawyer of ability, a noted writer on history and government, his books being regarded as standard works of reference, and he is well known in the field of finance.

He was born in Boston in 1856, the son of Augustus and Katherine Bigelow (Lawrence) Lowell. The city of Lowell, Mass., is named after his paternal grandfather, and the city of Lawrence, Mass., after his maternal grandfather. His father was the founder of the famous Lowell Institute, of Boston.

Professor Lowell first became well known to the educational world in 1898, when his Government and Parties in Europe appeared.

It is no small task that Professor Lowell has before him. The president no longer teaches, but gives his entire time to the management of the great organization which was started by John Harvard, in 1636, by the gift of 400 pounds. There are now over six thousand students in its college and professional schools, and the professors and instructors number over five hundred and fifty.

Daniel J. Keefe, of Michigan, has been nominated by the President to succeed the late Frank Sargent as Commissioner-General of Immigration. Mr. Keefe has been prominently identified with the work of organized labor in the Middle States.

LITTLE TALES OF THE CUMBERLANDS

By DR. W. L. STOOKSBURY

President Lincoln Memorial University

THREE years ago the 2d day of January was a very cold, bleak day. The ground was covered with snow, and the temperature was something below zero. I was busy in my office enrolling students, as this was the opening day after the holiday vacation. About 4 P.M. a young man walked into the room, carrying an old-fashioned portmanteau.

A Young Lincoln of the Hills (6 ft., 4 in.)

"Is this building the school house?" he asked.

"Yes, this is one of the school buildings."

"Well, I have come to go to school, an' I haven't got no money, hardly."

"Did you write me about coming?"

"No, I jist thought I would walk over here and see about my gittin' into the school."

"As this is the time when we have our largest attendance, I doubt whether I have any room for you. Did you bring your bed-clothing?"

"No, I didn't know you had to bring it."

"All we furnish in the dormitory rooms in the way of bedding is bedsteads, springs and mattresses; students furnish their own bed linen and pillows."

"Well, I haven't got no beddin', an' I have walked thirty-five miles through the snow of the mountains to git to the nearest railroad station, so it would be some time before I could send home an' git my bed clothes. If you have a room an' can git me a quilt, I will git along all right; I don't want to lay out to-night, but I have laid out."

I told him I would see what could be done. I called my wife, and said to her, "Find some bedding, if possible, for this young man." She went out and looked around, and found one quilt. He took it to his room, and for three nights, during the coldest weather in the year, slept on this bed, with no pillow and no covering except the one quilt. I entered him in school. He learned rapidly. Later I wrote a letter to our good friend, Mrs. Elizabeth K. Upham, of New York City, telling her that I needed $25 to help this boy through the school year. She very kindly sent the money. The young man studied part of the day, and worked part of the day, and, when school closed, had advanced rapidly in his studies and paid all his expenses.

He went back to his home on "Blacksnake," a creek in the mountains of Kentucky, and next summer was able to teach a public school for four months. After his public school closed, he came back to the university and took another course with us. He now holds a good position with the Louisville & Nashville Railroad in his native State, Kentucky.

Lincoln Memorial University believes in the establishment of not only industrial and literary schools, but trade schools. This young man took a course in telegraphy, and now, instead of getting twelve to eighteen dollars per month, as he did on the farm at home, gets from seventy-five to eighty-five dollars per month. These people need to learn trades; more intelligent labor is needed all through the mountain country, and of course with intelligent labor come better salaries.

A young man entered the school from a neighborhood near by, last December. He never had had the advantage of college training nor Sunday School, for the reason that the religious denomination in his neighborhood did not believe in Sunday Schools, and had preaching at their country church but once a month. This young man on entering the university was required to attend the Sunday School every Sunday, and to take a lesson in the Bible every Wednesday. This is one of the regulations at the university. Every Wednesday at 9:30 every student, from first preparatory to senior, takes a Bible lesson. Nobody is excused.

In January the annual revival meeting is held. At that meeting, this young man, among a number of others, was converted. The conversions range each year from forty to sixty. After his conversion, he took a more active part in the Sunday School and church work and the Young Men's Christian Association. When school closed in May, and he went home and found that he had no Sunday School nor Christian Association, he felt considerably at a loss and determined to organize a Sunday School, so he went to a number of the young people, his friends, and asked them to join him in the Sunday School. A number responded, and he, as superintendent, organized a Sunday School. In two weeks his minister came into the neighborhood, and the young man asked him to go to his Sunday School.

"No," said the minister, "we believe that the preachin' at the church is enough, and at that time the teachin' of the Bible is all that is needed."

The young man was not discouraged, however. He pushed ahead, and now has a very large and prosperous Sunday School meeting every Sunday.

Thus you see the influence that is going out yearly from Lincoln Memorial University to upbuild the cause of Christ where it has long been neglected, and especially the good it is doing in training the young people. It has been well said, "If the world is ever taken for Christ, it must be done by the young people."

The Famous Otey House
Occupied by Generals on both sides in the Civil War

PITTSBURG ROUSED BY A REVIVAL

WHAT he himself termed the most wonderful mission he ever conducted in America, brought out to hear Gipsy Smith, the famous English evangelist, such crowds as never before were drawn together by any religious movement in Pittsburg, although that city is a strong religious centre. From the first meeting, on the night of Saturday, January 1, until the lecture on Monday night, January 18, which marked the closing of the mission, the big Exposition Music Hall, which seats 5,000 persons, was filled to capacity at every meeting. At every night meeting, hundreds could not find seats, and this was the case at most of the afternoon meetings. From several night meetings thousands had to be turned away.

There were three Sunday afternoon meetings held for men only, and at each between 7,000 and 8,000 men attended, as many, in fact, as the police would allow to enter the auditorium. From each of the meetings, several thousand more were turned away.

"It is a grand thing when you see the men taking such interest in a mission like this," was a favorite remark of the evangelist. "It shows that the spirit of it has got a good hold; it shows that there is a lot of good in the world still."

To show his appreciation of the interest taken by the men, he directed on several evenings that a section of the best seats be reserved for them. "The men have to work all day and this is the only chance they get to come here," he told the women. "They've come right along and have been willing to stand. It won't hurt you to stand a while, when you're helping along the work of the Lord."

From the very outset, the preacher seemed to take hold of the people of Pittsburg. The curiosity with which many went to hear him first changed speedily to delight, and this, in turn, was followed by earnest attention and conviction. This explains how the meetings grew in size daily, until the limit of the great hall's capacity was reached, and how each of the three Sunday meetings for men was more remarkable than the one that preceded it. People rose by scores to make public expression of their desire to lead better lives when the Gipsy, in that wondrously sweet voice of his, pleaded with them, as a true brother might plead, to turn to God.

When he urged the people to bow their heads in silent prayer, to close their eyes and do nothing that might embarrass those who desired to come forward to the inquiry rooms to pray and be prayed with, the people heeded. Many came forward in response to his plea and in answer to the message he delivered with such telling and sympathetic force.

How many men and women were brought to better things during the mission of two weeks in Pittsburg it would be difficult to estimate. They filled the large inquiry rooms at almost every meeting, and more than one night they numbered hundreds. Frequently during his meetings, the Gipsy read letters that came to him from some anxious father, mother, brother or sister, asking prayers for an erring one, and now and then he dwelt on some particular touching feature of these letters, which in itself seemingly was sufficient to show many of the listeners the right path. His comments on the letters, made before his sermon proper, made many eyes moisten with tears. Among his auditors were men well known in public life, known to almost every other man in the audience, but who were not ashamed of their tears, nor were they ashamed to rise in answer to the Gipsy's question if they desired to be better Christians.

The climax of the mission came with the night march through the streets on Tuesday, January 12, followed by the midnight meeting at the largest theatre in the city. There had been hints thrown out that this night march through the slums and the midnight meeting held solely for the unconverted was a bid for the spectacular, and there was much curiosity to see how the ministers, who had given the evangelist their loyal support from the inception of the mission, would act toward it. They satisfied the curiosity by standing shoulder to shoulder with the Gipsy in the parade. To those who charged him with sensationalism, the Gipsy had this to say:

"We must take the Gospel out into the streets; we have kept it too long within the four walls of our churches. The souls of these people to whom we are going to appeal are as dear to God as the souls of those who are the pillars of the churches; and if only one soul is brought to God as a result, it will be recompense for all our efforts. Christ preached his Gospel in the streets; can we do better?"

Pittsburg never saw such a demonstration, under anything like similar circumstances, as was given that night when over 8,000 men and women marched the streets, headed by a platoon of police and the Salvation Army band, singing the old familiar hymns. For more than two miles they marched, and along the route every square was packed with watchers. At many points along the route, in front of the theatres and the main thoroughfares, fashionably dressed women and their escorts stood and saluted the evangelist. The night of the parade was the coldest of the winter. The slushy streets were just beginning to be cleaned after a heavy fall of snow.

A feature of the Gipsy's stay in Pittsburg, not connected with the work of the mission, was a visit he paid to a camp of gipsies, a few miles out of the city. The evangelist takes Saturday as a day of rest, and on this day it was suggested to him that it would be a nice thing to visit the people of his own race. He agreed delightedly, and, accompanied by several ministers and newspaper men, went out to the camp. He greeted the members of the colony in the gipsy tongue, and, although they were Roumanians and he an English gipsy, he had little difficulty in making himself understood. He had been in the camp only a few minutes when the wife of the leader of the band emerged from her tent-wagon and addressed him by name, and told him she had heard him in Manchester—her old home—and in this country she had heard him also. Sixteen years ago, when the queen of the camp (Mrs. George Mitchell) was a young girl, Bessie Gray, she had been ill at Ocean Grove, where Gipsy Smith was conducting a mission. She had sent word to him from her sick-bed, asking him to come and see her, but her request reached him as he was about to leave the city. He sent her, however, a cheering message and a little copy of some of his sermons. At the camp she asked him to her tent, and they talked in private for a few minutes, and she showed him the little volume of sermons he had sent her sixteen years ago. Before the last "kushti rharti" ("good night") was said, the Gipsy had got from his own people a promise to come to the meeting and hear him.

Gipsy Smith Visiting the Gipsy Camp near Pittsburg

So impressed were the members of the evangelical committee with the Gipsy and his wonderful work in Pittsburg that they voted unanimously to invite him to the city again on his next visit to the United States. Rev. George W. Taft, secretary of the committee, was directed to correspond with the Free Church Council of Great Britain, under whose charge the Gipsy conducts his missions, with this end in view.

A second feature of the Gipsy's visit was a dinner tendered him and Mrs. Smith on the evening of Saturday, January 16, at which, beside the evangelist and his wife, the evangelical committee had as guests the sixty-five policemen who, with Assistant Superintendent of Police Edward Kennelly at their head, had been detailed for duty at all the meetings.

The work of the Pittsburg police called forth expressions of praise from many persons, and none was more ready to pay tribute to them than the Gipsy himself. Both in public and in private he frequently said he had never been so well looked after, and it was a noteworthy fact that, in contrast with the Gipsy's visit to other cities, despite the crush at many of the meetings, not a person was injured.

Among the Workers at Home and Abroad

—ELMER S. HUBBARD, founder of the Industrial Home at Cardenas, Cuba, whose work has been greatly helped by readers of this paper, writes: "My wife and I, with two Cubán women to help us, have sixty-six children to care for, and we wish to add new features to our work, so we want to ask your readers, not for more money, but for one or more earnest Christians to come to help us in this work, and perhaps finally take it wholly from us. A man and his wife would be preferable, a man who could teach one or more trades."

—THE INDUSTRIAL HOME at Tappan, N. Y., for unemployed and homeless boys, is progressing favorably. Rev. E. Kimball is the superintendent. He says: "We have worked hard to make the Home self-supporting and wholly successful, and we are gaining ground. Scores have been taken in, rehabilitated and regenerated. We have been hampered by lack of facilities, and particularly for barn room. Our income has been limited. We are now working for a barn, and believe the money will be forthcoming. We also need second-hand clothing, to furnish a change to those who come to us. Contributions of money and clothing will be gladly acknowledged."

—REV. FRANK H. L. PATON, of the New Hebrides Mission in the South Pacific, writes: "The heathen have been particularly active of late. On South Santo, an inland tribe made a raid on a planter's homestead and murdered the settler and his two daughters. On Ambrim, a French planter was attacked and killed by the natives. The authorities of the joint government are now inquiring into these massacres and will no doubt teach the heathen a salutary lesson. The Gospel, however, is the only power that will change these savage hearts."

—A MOVEMENT HAS been started for a memorial to the late Bella Cooke, known as the "Saint of Second Avenue." It is proposed to endow a memorial bed in the Woman's Hospital, at 110th Street, between Columbus and Amsterdam Avenues, New York. Mrs. Cooke was one of the first patients in the hospital when it was organized, some fifty-five years ago. Any readers interested in the work can contribute to the Bella Cooke Memorial by sending their offerings through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

—MISSIONARY J. M. HOOVER, M. E. Mission, Sarawak, Borneo, writes: "We are trying to establish a Christian commonwealth in this great island. There seems to be no danger of our failing now, but of course it will be some time yet before we can stand alone, and perhaps many years before we are a great people. Our pepper and rubber gardens are doing well. We have set out three times as much rice as ever before. The churches have been crowded, and practically the whole colony has taken the communion."

—THE GREATER NEW YORK PHILANTHROPIC SOCIETY, incorporated in October last, is formed to provide and maintain coffee stands, food, shelter and relief to the needy, destitute and distressed, to procure work for the able-bodied poor, to promote social and sanitary reform, and to inculcate habits of providence and self-dependence. To the end of November, the Society served, gratuitously, over 2,000 meals to the needy poor and destitute. Mr. J. Wm. Marshall, 111 Broadway, New York, is Secretary of the Society.

The Appeal to Womanhood

IN a personal letter to the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the Italian Ambassador lays especial stress upon the horrible suffering now prevailing among the women and children of the devastated districts of Italy.

"Our Queen," he says, "is now most deeply concerned for the women left helpless, and the thousands of children orphaned. She herself will, whenever desired, appoint agents to distribute funds for the relief of these most pitiably bereft classes."

This is a work which should appeal most powerfully to our women's organizations. We will gladly use the especially efficient means at our disposal to co-operate with them in forwarding directly and immediately to the Queen of Italy whatever sums they may raise.

Queen Helena herself has graciously consented to administer, as a sacred trust, the contributions of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers for this particular work. The first $5,000 for this beautiful charity, designated as "The Widows' and Orphans' Fund," has already been cabled to Italy.

We believe this special branch of the relief work will prove a providential blessing to many thousands of a most helpless class. It was inaugurated in response to the thoughtful suggestion of several readers of this journal, who, with women's quick intuition, understood the special needs of the unfortunate mothers and little children, who were all too likely to be forgotten in the general rush and excitement of the rescue work. Send in your mite to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Italian Relief Fund to-day, in order that you may have a share in this most beautiful of all charities. Every gift will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The New Cuba

WITH the withdrawal of the American military forces in Cuba, the island republic starts once more on a career of self-government, under officials elected by the Cuban people. In their new start the Cubans have the earnest good will of the United States. That good will was shown on many occasions throughout Cuba's long night of Spanish oppression, and never more signally than when readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contributed one hundred thousand dollars in cash donations, and vast quantities of food and other supplies for the relief of reconcentrados and refugees.

American occupation has been of very great benefit to Cuba. Most important of all has been the work of sanitation, the stamping out of yellow fever by energetic measures of cleanliness, and the introduction of modern methods of hygiene in Havana and other cities in which medieval conditions had prevailed, and where the fatal consequences of the neglect of sanitary precautions had been ignorantly ascribed to Divine Providence. Transit facilities have also been introduced, and order established where chronic chaos had resulted from many years of guerrilla strife. The second occupation is at once a lesson and a warning that the United States will not tolerate a return to conditions which were a constant injury to this country, as they were a constant detriment to Cuba.

The Cuban people are starting out undoubtedly with the best intentions, and there can be no question as to the sincerity of their purpose to maintain relations of cordial amity with the United States. The maintenance of those relations will depend upon themselves, upon their willingness to co-operate with the United States in all that tends to promote the moral and material welfare of both republics. It is to be hoped, for instance, that there is no substantial ground for the report that the lottery and gambling interests, which have been practically driven from the Northern Continent, are seeking to make headquarters of Cuba, of course with the design of carrying on operations in this country. If there is truth, however, in the report, which has been widely published, that such a purpose exists, then the Cuban government will act wisely in putting an effective quietus on the scheme, and giving gamblers to understand that they can no more obtain official indorsement for their nefarious business in Cuba than in the United States. Thousands of American lives have been sacrificed and many millions of dollars expended to redeem Cuba from political anarchy and from being a menace to the physical well-being of North America. The American people are equally determined that Cuba shall not be a menace to the moral health of the United States; and we are confident that self-respect, gratitude and prudence will lead the Cubans to take the only safe and honorable stand on that issue, should it be raised. Meantime, we repeat, in behalf of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers, our assurance of heartiest good will toward Cuba, again free and independent.

California and Japan

TWO bills now before the California Legislature have stirred up a good deal of feeling, both in this country and Japan. One of these, known as the Drew bill, prohibits aliens from acquiring or holding real estate in California; the other—the Johnson bill—prohibits aliens from becoming directors in California corporations. Both are distinctly anti-Japanese measures, and have been introduced for the sole purpose of limiting the influence of that race in the Western State, and of discouraging Japanese immigration.

In view of our recent negotiations with Japan, and of the mutual assurances of cordial friendship which were lately exchanged between the two governments, following the visit of our fleet, it was to have been expected that any serious attempt to enact such legislation in the State where the original dispute with that country arose last year would acutely reopen the whole question. Not only were the recent mutual declarations of friendship given with a view to the avoidance of just such misunderstandings, but in the formal agreement between the two governments—which defined their respective rights in the Pacific and their joint attitude toward China—provision was made for the amicable adjustment of every question that should arise. Further, it was clearly understood that, by the recent arrangement with Japan, immigration from that country would sensibly decrease. Our authorities in Washington state that it has materially declined, proving that Japan is honorably carrying out her pledges.

This new California incident, on which certain "jingo" newspapers are basing lurid predictions of future trouble with Japan, will probably lead to no serious results. It is pretty well assured that the two bills in question will not become laws, and that no action will be taken upon them during the present session of the California Legislature. Governor Gillett is quoted as saying that he considers them "ridiculous," and, in the last resort, his official veto would probably be interposed to block them; but the general impression is that it will not be needed. By the President's desire, action on the bills will be deferred, and meanwhile, with fuller information on the whole question, it will no doubt be made clear to the people of California that such legislation would not only be unwise, but superfluous.

No "Violent Sisterhood" Here

WHILE it is generally conceded that there is a growing sentiment in this country in favor of woman suffrage, there is a very serious danger of which all the friends of the movement should be made aware, in order that they may avoid it.

In Great Britain, the suffrage question has been almost wrecked on the rock of unwomanly violence. Suffragettes have adopted tactics which have caused pain and vexation to many of the best women who are at the very front of the movement. They have invaded places of public assemblage and, with misdirected enthusiasm, have made many "scenes," which would have been better omitted.

There is no room for a "violent sisterhood" here. Any attempt to import the methods of those suffragettes here would inevitably discredit the whole movement. We earnestly hope we shall never be compelled to record the fact that American women resorted to such schemes as interrupting public meetings, invading churches, play-houses, concerts and the like by wild, guerrilla raids. It is reported that such plans are in contemplation. We trust they will be opposed by all sensible advisers.

Our women will win the suffrage, but it will come to them as a right, gallantly and gracefully conceded by American men, and not as the result of a policy of premeditated disturbance, which would turn the whole movement into contempt.

A Seasonable Offering

EVERY passing year shows a gratifying increase in the spiritual activities of the readers of this journal. Their good works go out literally "through all the earth." In every missionary field they are represented, and their benefactions are an encouragement and a blessing to hundreds of devoted workers at the front.

Recently, a number of our readers, desiring to emphasize the joy of the holidays by doing something for the missionaries at home and abroad, sent to us gifts of money for that purpose. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Banyan Tree for a Church

MRS. W. N. BREWSTER, a missionary of Hinghua, China, has written to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a most interesting letter about work among the lepers there. She describes the meeting of the lepers under a banyan three, which is used for a church, and she tells of the necessity for building a house of God where service can be held in all kinds of weather, to supplant the tabernacle of the tree. Part of her letter is as follows:

We have had Christian work among the lepers in the village near the west gate of Hinghua City, China, for more than twenty-five years. When we came to Hinghua, one of Mr. Brewster's first duties was to go out with the pastor of the city church to attend the burial of one of the leper Christians. That day an old patriarch, who had been bringing his fellow lepers to Christ, tottered to the front and begged the missionary to get money to build a church home for the lepers. "I am blind; I cannot live long, and I would like to know that you will not forget to bring the message to the lepers after I am gone hence to be with God." The plea went to the home churches, and the old man just lived to know the church was built, and said, like Simeon of old, "Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace." The work has gone on. We have never been without a preacher to the lepers since; none of these have been lepers. No hurt has come to any of them. At the present time there are about forty people attending the church regularly, and we have a school, which I examined a few days ago. About three years ago we opened the Lillian Gamble Leper Home for women, near Antau, and soon after sent a Christian leper to live at Ng Sauh (Yellow Stone), the third leper village in this region. Last year we gave them permission to open a school taught by the Christian leper. Two preachers are giving themselves to the work of saving the lepers in the three settlements. A few days ago I went to these leper villages. On the outskirts of the village, under the trees, I called them together to examine the students of the Word of God. It was very encouraging to know how much real truth these had received.

I wanted to tell you particularly of Ng Sauh. Under a great banyan tree they assembled. I supposed it was simply because it would be safer for me. I examined the pupils and was surprised in every way. One woman was asked some questions about the way of salvation. She replied, "Yes, I understand, but with such a crowd I fear I cannot explain eloquently." But her face and her words showed a good understanding. We held a service, and to my surprise again a large number took part in a reverent way. Before I left they made a plea for a church. "We meet under this tree, but now the cold weather is coming, and how can we meet in the howling north wind?" and pointing to a little room, with no front partition, they said, "That is all the place the teacher has to live." The school must meet under the self-same tree. During the rainy season, all services and the school must cease.

Who can give us three hundred dollars to build a church and school for these people? There are thirty lepers, who meet regularly under that banyan tree, seeking the way of life. During the rainy season they have nothing to do, and, if we have a place, all can come to learn to read their Bible, and others will be led to Christ.

The Remarkable "Banyan Tree Church," Near Hinghua, China

The groves were God's first temples. It was at the great oak, at the oracle of Dodona, that the Greeks were told where to go and what to do. It was a custom of the heathen to worship their idols on some hill or under a green tree. Some of God's children, through all the ages, have worshiped him under the trees as temples. What work can be more divine and imperative than that of bringing lepers to Christ?

And Jesus put forth his hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean. And immediately his leprosy was cleansed. (Matt. 8:3.)

Roosevelt Commends Missions

President Roosevelt recently addressed the African Diamond Jubilee of the Methodist Episcopal Church, held to commemorate the sending of the first missionary to the west coast of Africa, seventy-five years ago. The President lauded the spirit of civilization spread over the world by Europeans and Americans. He declared India was immeasurably better off for British rule, as was Algiers for the presence of the French, Turkestan for the rule of Russia and the negroes of Africa for the presence of the Germans. Admitting grievous wrongs against the American Indians, he said that even they stand on a far higher plane of happiness and efficiency to-day than before. He said:

In India we encounter the most colossal example history affords of the successful administration by men of European blood of a thickly populated region in another continent. It is the greatest feat of the kind that has been performed since the breakup of the Roman Empire. Indeed, it is a greater feat than was performed under the Roman Empire. Unquestionably mistakes have been made, but the fact remains that the successful administration of the Indian Empire by the English has been one of the most notable and most admirable achievements of the white race during the past two centuries. If English control were now withdrawn from India, the whole peninsula would become a chaos of bloodshed and violence.

After having commended the work of the Methodist missionaries in Africa, he called attention to the responsibility of the United States toward Africa, because of our past history and the fact that there are ten million negroes among our citizens.

Nations, as individuals, must count themselves as custodians of the divine blessing, and must feel their obligation to enlighten the minds, purify the hearts, and save the souls of the weaker races. While there has been too much plundering of the weaker by the stronger nations, the unselfish services of the missionaries sent to the weaker nations have greatly elevated the standard of their civilization, as well as aided in their spiritual salvation. Whatever of love or life God's nations have, they have for the benefit of those who have them not.

I am debtor, both to the Greeks and to the barbarians; both to the wise, and to the unwise. (Rom. 1:14.)

The World's Largest Mirror

The great $60,000 reflecting mirror for the Carnegie Solar Observatory, weighing six and one-half tons, has arrived at Pasadena, Calif., from France and is awaiting transportation to the lofty summit of Mount Wilson, where it is to do its work. This most valuable piece of glass in the world is destined to become a reflecting mirror, the modern substitute for the lens of a telescope. It will be kept in the observatory workshop for at least two years, while the process of grinding and silvering is being carried on. Mirrors have been in use since the earliest times. What strange things they are, sending back the images of the faces that look into them! By the help of this great mirror, God's bright worlds will be more distinctly seen. The Bible is a mirror into which God looks. Christ is the reflection of that image, and we, by looking at him, not only see God, but are conformed to his image.

But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord. (II. Cor. 2:18.)

Brought Home for Burial

A dispatch from the State Department to Dr. B. Austin Cheney, in New Haven, stated that the bodies of his brother, Arthur S. Cheney, and his wife, will be brought hame in the Ajax, a collier with the American Navy now in Italian waters. Dr. Cheney said that the wealth of a Vanderbilt could not have purchased the energy with which the sailor boys worked, till exhausted, in their loyal efforts to find the dead consul and his wife, and he is profoundly grateful to every branch of the American government.

Many have a wrong impression of the character of the American soldiers and sailors, considering them rough in their manners and not over careful in their morals. The officers and men who make up the American Army and Navy are not perfect, but they are splendid specimens of manhood. Each year their mental and moral standard seems to rise higher, and, when they are tried by emergencies, their unselfishness and bravery are truely heroic.

The lifeless bodies of the dead we love for the sweet spirits that tenanted them, and precious memories attend them as we lay them away in the cities of the dead, under the shade of the evergreen and amidst the perfume of the flowers.

And Rehoboam slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David. (I. Kings 14:31.)

Poison in the Cup

Charles N. Pippin, a prominent young business man of Marydel, Md., died from poison taken in a glass of wine during an amateur theatrical performance. Pippin, who was engaged to be married to a school teacher in his town, took part in the play. In one scene wine had to be drunk, and Howard Griffith, another performer, tasted it, found it unpleasant and merely touched his lips to the glass. Mr. Pippin, on the contrary, took a fairly large draught, and immediately remarked: "Oh! That burns bad! Give me some water, quick!" With great difficulty he dragged through his part of the play; went home, and, despite all medical efforts to save him, he expired. He had taken poison, which was evidently meant for some one else.

Irrespective of people's conscientious views upon the subject of intoxicants, the best scientific authorities in the world are coming to the conclusion that the liquors that are sold to-day are poisons, and the school books of most civilized nations include in their number volumes describing the deadly effect of alcohol.

Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging: and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise. (Prov. 20:1.)

Pigeon Photographers

Dr. Neubronner, of Cronberg, Germany, some seventy years ago, organized a carrier-pigeon mail for the conveyance of prescriptions from the surrounding villages to his drug store. His son, the doctor, a few years ago extended the pigeon mail service to the transportation of small quantities of medicines. He also provided a photographic outfit by which the carrier pigeons may take pictures on their journey. A miniature camera, allowing thirty views of one and a half inches square to be obtained at very short intervals, is fastened about the body of the bird. One type of apparatus comprises two self-contained cameras, with lenses pointing forward and backward, respectively, so as to obtain at least one view of the ground in any position of the pigeon. The shutter is released by a spoon-shaped lever, the cavity of which is thrown outward by a rubber ball filled with air and perforated by a minute opening. As the air escapes, the rubber ball collapses, permitting the lever to disengage the shutter. In the case of another form of apparatus a single lens is used in connection with a film, on which a number of successive exposures are made by a rubber ball and clock mechanism, at intervals of, say, one-half minute. Dr. Neubronner has been invited by the German government to conduct some experiments in conjunction with the balloon corps at Tegel, near Berlin. It is among the probabilities that pigeon photographers will be brought into service in some of the wars of the future in taking pictures of the enemy. This will not be the first time that birds have been called into the service of man. Early in the history of the race, a dove was sent out, which returned with exceedingly valuable information.

And the dove came in to him in the evening; and, lo, in her mouth was an olive wreath plucked off: so Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth. (Gen. 8:11.)

Messina's New Ordeal of Fire

A Homeless Old Woman Being Cared For by a Gendarme

Italian Soldiers Removing a Body from the Ruins

WITH the same fascination with which sailors gaze at a whirlpool, in which a stately ship has just been engulfed, do people still turn their eyes toward Southern Italy, the snow-covered hills about sunk and smouldering Messina, and the once fair land of Calabria. Every steamer is now bringing photographs taken in the stricken districts, and with them come fresh tales of suffering and wounds, hunger, families torn asunder, orphan children seeking a protector—tales that would melt a heart of stone and bring tears to the eyes of the most hardened.

Helping the Women and Children

A few refugees have already arrived in New York, most of them Italians who have already lived in America, but had returned to their own country for a while. One old woman was greeted tenderly at the dock by a distant relative. "I have lost all," said the woman, her voice breaking as she saw the row of sympathetic faces. "I have lost all my family. Seventeen there were, and they perished before my eyes." Another, a young man, has come back to begin life anew, with his brother, if life may be bearable to one whose wife and two little babies were torn from him in a second, and blotted out forever.

The public should not get the idea that with the disbandment of the American Committee in Rome there has been a cessation of the need in Southern Italy and Sicily. The committee had a specific work to perform—to charter a relief ship, the Bayern, load it with medical supplies, food, clothing and blankets for the immediate relief of the sufferers in Messina and its vicinity. The work was well performed, the Bayern delivering its cargo at Messina, Reggio and other towns on the straits. Only a small fraction of the sufferers, however, could be reached at the time. The American committee ceased its active work, as it was seen that it could be carried on much better by Italians, who had a knowledge both of the language and of the districts in which the work was to be conducted. Parts of Sicily and the greater part of the Province of Calabria, especially inland, where there are hundreds of ruined villages, have received but little assistance—some, in fact, none at all. The greater work of general relief will now go on exclusively under the Italian Red Cross, without the aid of auxiliary committees.

Meanwhile, having done their part in the general relief work, where their gifts have been the means of saving thousands of the famishing and destitute, the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD find providentially allotted to them the special task of providing shelter, food, clothing and medicines for the poor Italian widowed mothers and their helpless babies. Under the personal direction of the good Queen Helena, who has made this beautiful mother-and-child charity her own, we have the royal assurance that every gift sent by our readers will be sacredly administered. So many of this unaided class are suffering that there is room for a great world-wide work of charity and humanity among them alone. We would urge every reader of this journal to respond to the good Queen's appeal by sending a gift to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund to be used for the widowed mothers and their fatherless babies.

Messina Again Swept by Fire

A second fire has added to the horrors of the situation in stricken Messina. Since the first conflagration, immediately following the shocks which threw down most of the city, the soldiers have been very careful to guard against a repetition. With the great mass of building material, broken beams, floors and roofs, a chance spark or dropped light from the hands of some member of a searching party was liable to start a fire that could only be subdued with the utmost difficulty. On Tuesday, the 19th, a small blaze was discovered in the ruins of the Palazzata. There was a high wind, and soon all of the cracking and ruined structures to the left of Messina's town hall, and stretching toward the custom house, were a roaring mass of fire. The flames seemed bent on destroying everything the earthquake had left. The fire, when dying down above, would creep under the ruins and burst out at some new and advanced point.

The warships in the straits saw the glare, and, with all speed possible, the sailors landed their fire apparatus and pumps and started for the scene. It was a fearful task. In some places the streets are piled thirty feet high with rubbish, and when a hand engine would be half way up the heap rolling brick and stone would threaten to carry engine and sailormen to the bottom.

The Duke of Genoa took command, and soon soldiers and sailors were desperately fighting the flames, which extended for half a mile. All had the agonizing thought that people pinned among the ruins were probably being burned alive. The Duke of Genoa rescued a poor woman, who had gone insane. She insisted in forcing her way into a burning pile of ruins, where she cried that her husband was being burned alive. The Duke grasped her, but she almost pulled him into the flames with her. With a determined effort he pushed her back, and both were saved.

The fire destroyed the one handsome promenade along the water front, and completed the destruction of the Micolia, Cassibilia and Pennisi Palaces, with their treasures of art. Much of the statuary, it was hoped, could some day be dug out, but it is now undoubtedly calcined beyond hope of recovery. The next morning Messina again presented another tragic picture in addition to the many it has shown to the watchers on the ships. It was still burning fiercely, sending up dense clouds of smoke against the white snow, which had fallen during the night.

.Refugees in the Snow

The sufferers, hungry and scantily clothed, have had to go through, first, several earthquake shocks, a fire, a rain storm, extending intermittently over several weeks, a second fire, and a snow storm. Those who are camping in the hills are walking about on the snow in their bare feet. There seems to be nothing left to test the endurance of these suffering and patient people. Their white faces seem set with a look of dumb despair, and one poor man illustrates the feeling of many. When asked to go across the straits, "What is the use?" he asked, plaintively, "when the world is coming to an end?" Hundreds of refugees, who are met in every town

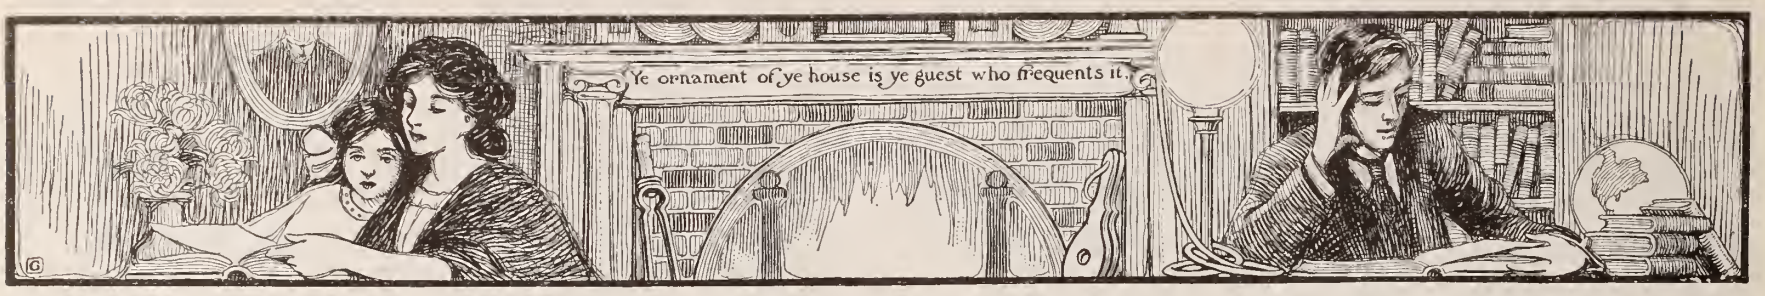
Wounded Lying by the Railroad Track Until an Ambulance Train Arrives

How the Streets of Messina Appear, with Rubbish Reaching to the Third Stories

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH



In the Training of Our Sons

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WRITING to the editor, one of our readers makes a strong point as to training our sons in the practice of kindness to animals. She has been deeply pained many times by the savagery of the small boy who throws stones at birds, treats cats and dogs with cruelty, and in fact torments every living thing within his reach, unless it is strong enough to retaliate. The boy who indulges a passion for unkindness to animals is generally a bully and a coward. He cringes in the face of danger, and domineers over his little sister. What can mothers be thinking of who do not repress the dawnings of this instinct in their boys? Our correspondent further speaks with emphasis against stories of hunting as in her view ill-chosen reading for boys, who straightway long for a gun that they may go out and kill an innocent rabbit or squirrel.

When Rudyard Kipling lived in Vermont, he put on record his conviction that the people about him were happiest when they could sally forth intent on killing almost anything that could run or fly.

There are two opinions as to the propriety of hunting for sport. Some of our greatest men find delight in hunting big game apparently for the pure pleasure of taking aim at a noble elk or a grizzly bear. Equally, lions and tigers will lead them in search of the sport they love. Endurance of hardship, courage in the face of peril and a healthy outdoor life are urged in favor of the sportsman and his pursuits. Yet when one realizes how easy it is to take life and how impossible to give it back, it does seem as if wanton destruction of creatures that are not wanted for food or clothing has little to excuse it. Whether we approve or disapprove of hunting, there cannot be a woman anywhere who will disagree with our correspondent as to the importance of training boys to be kind to animals. A pet in the house, for the care and comfort of which a boy is responsible, is likely to educate him in this direction quite as thoroughly as will the precepts of his mother. Every boy should have a dog for a companion, if he is fortunate enough to live outside of city limits. A cat should be a familiar object in every house.

THE OLD SCHOOLMASTER

No emperor in royal state
Was a more powerful potentate
Than the schoolmaster used to be,
In "dear old days" of poesie.

How fierce his frown, grim brows beneath!
Yon little boy scarce dares to breathe.
Those were "the good old times," they say;
Give us the teachers of to-day.

How to Dress a Girl of Fifteen

At fifteen the young girl has definitely left the ranks of the children and taken her first step across the bridge that leads to womanhood. She has several very beautiful years before her, years in which she will be a dear child at home, but in which she will also be a little woman. She should not be treated in these days as if she had no right to opinions of her own. In reality she has a good many decided opinions, and sometimes she expresses them a little too vehemently. This is the mere froth and exuberance of her transition time. She will never be fifteen again, so if she pleases to talk in superlatives, if she giggles among her companions or laughs immoderately, be chary of reproof. She is a little like a young colt in pasture. Just yet she cares very little for boys, and if she has been brought up in school with them, sharing the same recitations and being treated as an equal and a comrade, she is in no danger of drifting into foolish sentiment or desiring to flirt with boys she does not know.

How to dress the girl of fifteen puzzles her mother not a little. If there are older girls in the family, this little maid may be kept longer in leading strings than if she is an only daughter. Her dresses should come nearly to the tops of her shoes in winter and be ankle length in summer, unless she is very tiny for her age. She may wear her hair either in one braid or in two, as she chooses, but it is important that her ribbons should be broad and tied in rather large bows.

The young girl wears what are called jumper dresses over white waists, or she may wear separate waists and skirts. The keynote of this young girl's dress should be simplicity. Furbelows and ornaments, elaborately trimmed hats, anything that savors of display, and anything extreme, should be avoided. She is so pretty in her own right that she does not need ornament, and jewelry is for her elders, not for her.

Whenever the mother can she should consult the daughter's taste as to the way her dresses are made, their material and color. Too many changes of costume at once are a great mistake. The girl will grow out of them, and she needs only what will make her comfortable and enable her to present a good appearance in church on Sunday and at school on other days.

The American Husband

PERHAPS less would be heard about the frequency of divorce in America if we took into account the vastness of our territory and the immense publicity that is given by the press to the details of private life. Notwithstanding opinions to the contrary, our people, by millions, are happy in marriage and the family as an institution rests on a firm foundation. One may travel through familiar country places for miles, passing from village to village without encountering a single homestead that has been darkened by domestic disruption. That unfortunately there are divorces that might have been prevented by a little forbearance on the part of those most nearly concerned, is perfectly true and much to be lamented. Among those who have abundant means for material comfort, and on whom is laid no terrific burden of ever-increasing poverty, divorce followed by remarriage is far more frequent than in any other class. Where husbands and wives toil together for the raising of their children, where each incurs self-denial and makes sacrifices for the sake of the other, there is less danger of fatal misunderstanding than where men are absorbed in money-making and women weary of social dissipation.

A recent novelist, writing a greatly criticised book, placed the responsibility for unhappy marriage upon the wife rather than on the husband. In his view, the American wife was a restless, unsatisfied, extravagant or frivolous person. He pictured his men as sometimes reckless, sometimes shallow, and sometimes unscrupulous in business, but, in most cases, they were disposed to be loyal to wife and home. His arguments were not entirely fair to the woman, but, on the whole, they dealt justly with the man.

We may search the world to find a better husband than our own home product. An American husband is devoted to his wife in a sense a little different from the phrase as applied to the foreign husband. Chivalrous by impulse, indulgent in practice, ready to yield almost everything to her slightest wish, the American husband treats his wife as if she were a reigning sovereign. Women of other countries look with envy on the women of America, who seem to them to be the spoiled darlings of fortune. Whereas, in other lands, the man of the house is the personage most considered and the one whose will is law, with us the opposite prevails, and it is the wife who is the dictator and autocrat, and the husband who carries out her wishes to the utmost extent of his power. If American women have more time for reading, more opportunities for diversion, more leisure to travel and greater room for expansion in the way of independence than any other women on the globe, it is to their husbands that they owe a debt of gratitude.

Many of our women have gone far afield to find their companions in marriage. No doubt there are extremely fortunate international marriages, but the girl who marries a man who has been educated in circumstances and according to traditions different from hers runs a risk of being disillusionized. Not her husband alone, but his female relations, nearer or remoter, will play a part in her happiness or unhappiness. Relations-in-law are not always congenial in America, but the American wife and the American husband are both able to deal with them on equal terms, or, if necessary, they may preserve relations of neutrality.

How They Helped the Bread Line

HOW very few among us have realized, through personal experience, what the pangs of starvation may, or may not, accomplish; with our minds, our bodies, or even with our immortal souls!

How very few stop to think what it might mean to be homeless, friendless, utterly destitute and starving—slowly starving—to death!

Have you ever looked at the physical effects of starvation, as written on the ghastly faces and shrunken forms of your less fortunate fellow-men?

Twenty-five hundred starving men may be interviewed every night in New York City, at the unhallowed hour of one o'clock; stretching in a great long line, that winds up and down and in and out through the silent, deserted thoroughfares of the Bowery. Heedless of the biting, wintry winds, careless of the snow and sleet, they huddle together for warmth, yet huddle not so that their rightful places in this dreadful line of starvation may be usurped, and lost to them. Some carry a little rag of sacking, others a board—the lid of a barrel, mayhap—on which to stand their feet and so separate them, even that little, from the frozen snow. This footrest they push forward, as the line moves slowly onward. Many of them have been standing on this miserable protection since before midnight, fearful lest they should be last on the line, and so jeopardize their chance of a mouthful of food. Look at their shivering, shrunken bodies; see the great, wistful eyes, staring from pale, bloodless faces. Watch how wolfishly anxious they grow, as they near the Mission door; and how their hungry eyes glare into the lighted room, fearful lest those who had gone in ahead of them would leave nothing behind!

This is starvation!

On Saturday afternoon I was idly looking out at the drifting snow, that whirled and eddied like dry sand with each puff of the cold wintry blast. It was "blizzard" weather, and, as I gazed from my sheltered window, I thought of the poor fellows who would have to line up in the Bread Line that night; of the workless men, who, in this great, wealthy city, have nowhere to shelter them or to lay their heads and rest.

I was called to the desk. Two men, I was told, wished to speak to me. As I went toward them I saw that they were poorly yet comfortably clad—workmen out of work, most likely. Another appeal, thought I. Whatever can we do for this unending throng of unfortunates? The men were no better dressed than those who assemble nightly in the Bread Line, with the exception that these had overcoats on—the pawnshop had not yet got them. They were unkempt and dirty; but, as I came nearer, I noticed that their dirt was of the wholesome, grimy kind; the dirt that comes to men who are fortunate in being blessed with the boon of labor.

Pulling off their hats, they exposed to view rough, touzled heads—touzled and matted with the sweat of work. They looked at each other, and then suddenly started off together, "We've called to see you—" They stopped. "You give it him, Tom," said one. "No, you!" said the other. "You've got the paper." "This is Mr. Earl, ain't it?" said the first. "We hear that you take in money here. I mean"—he hurriedly went on to explain—"that you take in money here for the poor chaps as is out of a job." "Ye-es," I said, slowly, not quite comprehending this unusual approach. "What can I do for you?"

They didn't reply for a bit, but "Tom" watched his companion, who began fishing up, from out of the apparently bottomless pocket of a well-worn overcoat, a mixture of dimes and dollars and cents and quarters and nickels. Gathering the heap together, in two great, big, black, muscular fists, he said, "You have the paper, Bob. Tell him how much it is!"

"Bob" fished a sheet of smudged foolscap from out of his pocket, and, after several attempts to make it out, handed it over to me to do so. "But what is all this for?" I asked. "This here," he replied, "is for the pore chaps as have nowheres to go at nights. It's from us to them, God help 'em!" "But you men cannot afford to do this, can you?" I asked. "Is it your intention to donate this money to the Bread Line?"

"Well, you see," said "Bob," "it was just like this: The money's not azackly our'n. The fellows up at the yard says, says they, "This is an awful cold snap. Let's make a collection for the pore fellers as is out o' job.' God help 'em! We know what it is; and, though we take care of our own crowd, we knows as there's lots of fellers as has no one to fall back on; an' so the boys all chipped in, and this is what we made up!"

This was Charity!

They refused, absolutely, to give their names; but, looking over the straggling list of some thirty or forty contributors, I learned that this thrice blessed and thrice holy gift came from the earnings of the workers in the train yards of the New York Central Railroad.

Thus are the poor ever the most ready to help the poor; for they know! Yes, bitterly indeed do they know!

Money is helpful—is indeed salvation to those starving men; but if you in the city, who read this, would hunt up some odd jobs around your houses, or create a little supplementary work in your factories and offices—something that might be left over till the summer, but that could be done just now; and if you people in the country would think up some labor around your barns and cuthouses, or formulate your spring plans a little ahead of time, you will not only experience the exquisite pleasures of "Sweet Charity," but you will benefit yourselves in the doing of real live missionary work; probably saving the lives, and mayhap the souls, of honest working men. Remember that these men are waiting! That the work is not wanted next April, or next June—it is needed now!

Come! What say you? Will not you also "chip in," with a little work, for these workless men?

JOHN C. EARL,
Financial Secretary of the Bowery Mission, 92 Bible House,
New York City.

God is Love

BY FRANKLIN D. HALE

FAR more than I've deserved I have enjoyed,
For God is love; [prized,
I've blessings known that have been scarcely
For God is love;
Accept my praise, dear Father, for thy care,
And grant that in thy glory I may share.

Life's burdens may seem hard for me to bear,
Yet God is love;
How often am I called to do and dare,
Yet God is love;
In him I'll trust, whate'er my fear may be,
And each new day his grace will make me free.

Earth's night will close, and heaven's dawn appear,
For God is love; [clear,
The storms will pass, and all will be made
For God is love;
I know I shall forevermore abide,
In perfect peace, near to my Saviour's side.

THE NOTHFIELD CALENDAR

Particularly worthy of mention among the many art calendars for 1909 is the "Northfield Calendar." Six large sheets of cream linen paper, rough edges, give not only the twelve months of the year, but a most delectable feast of art and literature as well. Each page is illustrated with a view taken in or around beautiful Northfield, printed on a separate sheet and tipped on. Added to this are a poem and selections from famous authors. The whole is printed in soft sepia browns. Price 50 cents. Record of Christian Work, publishers, East Northfield, Mass.

A Customer Asks a Question.

A customer writes: You say Ivory Soap is 99 44/100 per cent. pure. Why do you not make it 100 per cent. pure?

For the reason that it is not practicable to do so. There must be some substance in soap which is not soap, just as there must be some alloy in gold. And for the selfsame reason — to hold it together.

The ambition of a good soap maker is to produce a soap with a minimum of impurity. Ivory Soap fulfills this requirement. It contains less than one-fourteenth as much impurity as a gold coin does.

One Pupil Writes:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I have reduced those hips and I feel so well I want to shout. I never get out of breath now. When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy. I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Too Thin? You can be round, plump, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be, why should you not?

A pupil who was thin writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I want it, and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you.

The Little Doctor

A New Serial Story Written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

George Hunter and Dudley Verner were college chums and are stopping at the country home of the former, before George is about to start practice as a lawyer and Dudley as a physician. George is introduced to Miss Danforth, daughter of Squire Danforth, who lives on the fine estate called "Paradise." Dudley is most anxious to meet her. A village character, Jack Green, takes them to see "Paradise." He says that they do not often receive company, but spend much time in travel. They there meet Miss Danforth at the well, and Dudley is introduced. A thunder storm comes up and the young men are invited to take shelter in the house, where they stay to dinner. As they leave, the Squire drives by on the way home. His daughter is surprised at his sudden return. She explains why the young men had been there. He says he is particular about his visitors, and asks her not to do more than recognize them hereafter. He says that he is going abroad, and will take her and her aunt. They go to call on Mrs. Hunter and her niece, Miss Sanborn. The Squire discovers that Mrs. Hunter is an old friend. On his return he tells Aunt Phœbe a family secret, which greatly agitates her, but which she cannot tell Miss Danforth. Marian stays up until early in the morning, when the aunt falls asleep. That day Mr. Hunter and Mr. Verner call to wish them a pleasant voyage. Dudley Verner starts life as a doctor in a quiet neighborhood. The two friends save a little boy named Donald Fraser from being run over, and Dudley takes him home and brings George the next day to see him. Mrs. Fraser faints as George says, "Ellen, is it you?" A letter is received from Marian, who is in Scotland, telling of a visit to her mother's grave. Mrs. Fraser was George's aunt, who had run away to marry Captain Fraser, of whom her family disapproved. They lost track of her. George finds she has been badly treated and deserted. He plans to take her to his mother. Mrs. Fraser discovers that her husband still lives and again disappears. Squire Danforth finds a friend in an insane asylum who has information which may lift his daughter writes, a cloud from his life. George's mother is greatly worried by the disappearance of Ellen, and her son plans to take her away for a change of scene. She proposes to go to Long Branch. Jack Green, who first took George to the Squire's grounds, comes to George's office and informs him that Captain Fraser had come to Branksome and was looking for the Hunter family to find his wife. George returns, and has the mother and cousin prepare an early start. Green drives Fraser to the Hunter home so slowly, that he arrives too late to see Mrs. Hunter.

CHAPTER XI

ONLY when they were several miles from Branksome Station, with the certainty that there was not another train for New York for several hours, did those who knew why they had taken such a sudden start breathe freely.

Mrs. Hunter was feeling comparatively well, and when they stopped to change cars and take supper, George produced a letter which he had received just before boarding the train. After they had partaken of a slight repast, he gave it to his cousin, saying, "Your European letter, Lily. Suppose you read it now while we wait. It will do mother good."

The letter was one of descriptive travel. The writer said: "Business will oblige my father to remain abroad for some time. We have traveled here and there, seeing much of interest."

Mrs. Hunter's anxieties concerning their arrival at New York were set at rest by a telegram from Dudley, who promised to meet them upon the arrival of the train.

An unlooked-for delay was caused by a freight wreck; so that they arrived at New York only a short time before the train which had left Branksome late at night. Poor Mrs. Hunter was thoroughly worn out, and Dudley was alarmed when he saw her.

He had secured rooms at a hotel as near his office as was practicable, and now he insisted (knowing nothing of the attempted interview by Captain Fraser at Branksome) that George should have his mother remain for some days, in order to recover from her fatigue.

About an hour after they arrived, Mrs. Hunter fell into a quiet sleep, much to the delight of her niece and Elsie, both of whom had been anxious as to the effect which the journey would have upon her. George had gone with Dudley to give him an account of their recent adventures, when a messenger came to say that a gentleman was in the parlor, who wished to see Mrs. Hunter. As Elsie gave this message in a low tone to Miss Sanborn, they looked at each other in mute distress. Elsie broke the silence by saying, "It maun be the rascal himsel'."

Lily replied, "I fear so." Then, stepping to the door, she said to the messenger, "Tell the gentleman that Mrs. Hunter is ill, and for a number of days will probably be unable to see anyone; but that Mr. Hunter, her son, who is out at present, will be in in a short time, and will see anyone who has business with his mother."

Presently the messenger returned, saying that the gentleman was a relative of Mrs. Hunter and must see her at once on important business. Lily became alarmed, and wringing her hands, said with a look of agony, "Oh, Elsie, what shall we do?"

"Let me go to him, Miss Lily. I'll settle the gentleman, I'se warrant ye!"

Without waiting for permission, Elsie started; and was soon face to face with Captain Fraser (for he it was). From him she learned that he had arrived at the station a few minutes after their delayed train, and, while their party were still making arrangements for the disposal of their baggage, had heard the order which had been given to their driver.

He grew very loud in his demands to see Mrs. Hunter and his wife, refusing to believe that she was not of their party. He declared that if she had been anywhere in the neighborhood of New York, she could not have failed to see one of the many advertisements which he had inserted in order to find her.

Elsie retorted angrily, that he did not deserve to find her, "a dear, beautiful lass like Miss Ellen."

The man flew into a rage; and, when George returned, he was startled to hear Elsie in angry altercation with some one. He entered just in time to see the irate captain shaking his clenched fist at Elsie, whom he called "a meddling servant, who did not know her place."

George strode up to him, and said, "Sir! what do you mean by insulting this good woman? I will not hear her abused by you."

"Never fear, Mr. George. I'm no feared that Captain Fraser can harm me."

"Is it possible, sir, that you are Captain Fraser?"

"It is, sir. Who are you?"

"I am George Hunter. May I ask what is your business here?"

"My business, sir, is with your mother, and I may say it is concerning my wife. Do you know where she is?"

"No, unhappily for her, I do not. I was only a boy when you took her from us, but I know enough about you to have no hesitation in saying that if I did know where she was I would not tell you."

"Dare you say that to me?" cried Captain Fraser.

"Yes, and I have learned certain facts about you, which if in any way you molest her will place you where you will not trouble her any more for some time," and, stepping closer to him, George whispered something in his ear which made him turn pale as death.

"Who told you that?" he faltered.

"No matter who told me. I know it, and I order you now to leave this place at once. My mother is too ill to see you, and I do not wish her even to know of your presence here."

With a muttered imprecation, Captain Fraser departed, and George, hastily summoning Lily and Elsie to a conference, proposed that as soon as possible they should start for Long Branch. He then rushed out to find Dudley and tell him of his adventure and of their changed plans.

Dudley heard with consternation the news of the interview, and expressed regret that Mrs. Hunter should be hurried away before she was thoroughly rested; but he agreed with George that, under the circumstances, she had better go.

Without explaining to her the reason for this second hasty move, they told her that they had decided that the sooner she could have the benefit of the sea air the better. They had as merry a meal together as possible, served privately, and just as the shades of night were falling they reached Long Branch.

The young men started out for a stroll, after Mrs. Hunter had retired for the night, with the faithful Elsie close at hand as companion and watcher. She had borne the journey much better than they had expected, not having any suspicions of the exciting scenes which had just been enacted so near her.

As they were passing a cottage near the beach, George startled his friend by grasping his arm and saying, "Stop, Dudley!"

"What is the matter, George?"

"I thought I saw Donald Fraser a moment ago! Surely no other child looks exactly like him, and this one was lame, too. Can Ellen and her child be here? He disappeared so quickly among the crowd on the piazza that I could not follow him. That villain is on the alert, so that we cannot, for a time, venture to put in an advertisement that would call her attention to us."

"Well, George, let us go home to our hotel, and sleep over the matter before deciding what to do."

CHAPTER XII

GEORGE and Dudley decided to remain over the next day, in the hope of hearing something of Ellen and her child. They wandered along the beach scanning eagerly every group of children; but they failed to see among them all the beautiful face of the little one in whom they were so much interested.

For a time they did not speak. At last Dudley said, "I cannot account for this longing for home ties that has come over me—for father, mother, brother or sister. How gladly would I give all my wealth for even one of them!

"Come, let us sit down for a while," he continued. "I want to tell you something of my life history. I have, as I have told you, no remembrance of my mother. Often in my boyhood, as I saw my companions go with all their joys and sorrows to their mothers, and noted the looks of love and sympathy that were given to them, I used to turn aside with eyes full of tears. You know I spent a part of my life in Spain, but the greater part was spent in the United States. My father was supposed to have been lost at sea, and the only parents I ever knew were adopted ones.

"I had a happy home in my boyhood, so far as wealth could supply my every wish. Mr. and Mrs. Verner, who adopted me, were traveling in Spain when they took me, a helpless infant, without a home or a known living relative, and legally adopted me, giving me the name that I have ever since borne. I learned, years afterward, that my father's own name was Ferrer.

"Unhappily for me, my adopted parents died some years before I became of age. They left in trust for me their entire fortune. Dear old Dr. Bell, who was my guardian, died soon after I became of age.

"When I became acquainted with you at college, George, my heart went out to you as a brother, and now that I have found a place in your mother's heart I feel as if I ought to be content; and yet at times my heart cries out for some one of my own blood."

"My dear brother," said George, feelingly, "I thank you for this confidence. Our home is your home, but I do fondly hope that in time there will be a better one for you. In the future you will surely have dear ones of your own to love."

"No, George, I do not believe I shall ever marry; but I mean to work hard and gain a high place in my profession. I shall be content if I can only do some good among the poor. You can hardly imagine—no one can, who is not a physician—the pleasure one feels in relieving pain and distress. I had a plan in my mind by which I hoped to help your little cousin, and perhaps entirely cure his lameness. What pleasure it would give his mother to see the little fellow able to walk without the aid of his crutch! It seems too bad that we should have come across them so strangely, to be separated so soon. Surely if that was Donald whom you saw, we shall see him again here."

worthy." The violin was old, it was really out of tune, but the player of the violin was Ole Bull, the master musician of his day, and the power was not in the instrument but in the master.

If our lives could be as completely yielded to our great Master as was the violin to Ole Bull, the whole world would be charmed by the beauty and power of the Christian life. Then we shall be victorious in the time of trial, for even though the nights be dark and the burdens heavy we can hear him say, "Fear not, I am with thee," "Thou art mine," "My grace is sufficient for thee."

When, sin-stricken, burdened, and weary,
From bondage I longed to be free,
There came to my heart the sweet message:
"My grace is sufficient for thee."

Though tempted and sadly discouraged,
My soul to this refuge will flee,
And rest in the blessed assurance:
"My grace is sufficient for thee."

My bark may be tossed by the tempest
That sweeps o'er the turbulent sea—
A rainbow illumines the darkness:
"My grace is sufficient for thee."

O Lord, I would press on with courage,
Though rugged the pathway may be,
Sustained and upheld by thy promise:
"My grace is sufficient for thee."

Soon, soon will the warfare be over,
My Lord face to face I shall see,
And prove, as I dwell in his presence:
"His grace was sufficient for me."

Then we shall be triumphant in the journey of life; we are not always understood, we are sometimes criticised, but if we are His—fear not, be strong.

Men may misjudge thy aim,
Think they have cause for blame,
Say thou art wrong—
Hold on thy quiet way;
Christ is the Judge—not they;
Fear not! Be strong!

A Health-Warning to You

The United States Government Says:

"Benzoate of Soda (in foods) is highly objectionable and produces a very serious disturbance of the metabolic functions, attended with injury to digestion and health."

U. S. Dept. of Agriculture Bulletin No. 84, Part 4, 1908.

Benzoate of Soda is a powerful chemical anti-ferment—tasteless, odorless, imperceptible. It is a coal tar product; not a food; not a form of baking soda, as many believe.

Benzoate of Soda permits the use of inferior raw materials. Its presence too often indicates positive unwholesomeness or unsanitary preparation, or both—the kind of food you would not care to eat if you could see it made and what it is made of.

While experts may differ upon these points, the weight of scientific opinion, the world over, is opposed to Benzoate of Soda and all artificial preservatives in foods. There is, therefore, a grave doubt, at least, and where a doubt exists concerning a matter that affects your own health, who should have the benefit of the doubt—you or some manufacturer who is not concerned for your welfare?

Examine Food Labels Carefully!

The Government authorities require that when a food contains Benzoate of Soda, it shall be so labeled. This labeling is always obscure; you must look closely for the statement "Contains one tenth of one per cent Benzoate of Soda.

This Atlas, substantially bound, can be purchased of the China Inland Mission, School Lane, Germantown, Pa., or through any of the branches of the mission in London, Toronto, Melbourne and Shanghai. A Vigorous Christian*

IN reading this affectionate tribute of a daughter and of a co-worker to a noble and unselfish life, one realizes afresh the great work which is done by the quiet laborers, who seek not fame nor honors, but only the Master's glory. Dr. Wilson, in his ministry in his beloved Canadian parish; as a helper to Dr. Rainsford at St. George's in New York; associated with Dr. Simpson in his Gospel Tabernacle work; in the Salvation Army; and, last of all, in the "Christian and Missionary Alliance," exemplified constantly the humble follower of Christ, seeking never his own, but always the things of the kingdom. He cared not if his name were never known outside of the circles to which from time to time he ministered. His saintly life was lived solely to help his fellow men; and he remains immortal in those minds > made better by his presence;

> In pulses stirred to generosity; . . . in scorn
> For miserable aims that end with self.

The substantial building of the New York Missionary Institute, at Nyack, stands as one of his earthly monuments. He had spent for years the greater part of his meager salary for this and for the other benevolent institutions in which he was interested, notably the Seaman's Mission, of which he was the president at the time of his death.

From a chronic invalid, Dr. Wilson had been transformed into a strong and vigorous man, through the agency of direct "Divine healing," and he believed that all by faith might avail themselves of Christ's help, physically as well as spiritually. He lived a beautiful life.

and village, which has a few standing huts to cover them, seem to have had the hope and energy so characteristic of the race completely crushed out of them. The work of relief among the village people is as yet scarcely undertaken by the Italian government, the cities being given first attention. On Saturday, January 16, the bodies of the American consul, Dr. Arthur S. Cheney, and his wife were at last discovered in the ruins of the consulate. It took over a week to dig out the bodies after the American sailors began on the stupendous task. The first detail was from the Yankton; then Rear-Admiral Sperry, of the battleship fleet, decided to put on sixteen officers and two hundred and fifty men from the battleship Illinois. They began excavations in several places and soon the call of one party drew all to a part of the ruins in which the consul's bedroom had been situated. The bodies showed beneath the debris, and it was found that they had been in their bedroom, on the first floor, when the shock came. The bed had turned over and then the ceiling had fallen in, crushing them to death. The bodies were easily recognizable. They were placed in sealed cases, and the sailors tenderly draped over each a large American flag; then the mournful procession started for the harbor front, the Italian soldiers and sailors saluting as the coffins passed. The bodies were placed on the Culgoa and sent to Naples; from there they will be sent to New Haven, Conn., for burial.

The new American consulate will be at Catania. The Illinois has left, so there are now no American warships at Messina.

Some wonderful stories of people surviving for weeks and days under the ruins are still being told. Three little boys made an early trip to the kitchen on the morning of the earthquake. They were helping themselves to the good things in the pantry when the house caved in over them. In an instant all was dark, and they thought the world was at an end. For eighteen days they were buried, but the supplies in the pantry still held out. One of the youngsters got tired of confinement and worked industriously on one side of the room. He got out so far that his cries for help were heard by a passerby, and a rescue party was soon at work. The three were rescued unhurt. A short distance away, two little boys were dug out at about the same time. They had had no food and looked like living skeletons or like the little people who made such a pitiful picture during the Indian famine. They were taken to a hospital, and there is hope of their ultimate recovery.

If not, use

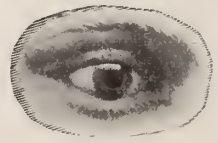
for 15 days at our expense.



THE NORMAL EYE

It helps Nature in a purely natural way to strengthen the eyes and restore the natural vision. Its action is in the nature of a gentle massage, which stimulates the eyes by restoring the normal circulation of blood—that is all that weak eyes require. But it does more—it moulds the eye painlessly but surely to its perfect shape. This is necessary to correct near-sight, far-sight, astigmatism, and kindred defects. It is absolutely safe—it does not come in direct contact with the eyes; and five minutes' manipulation, in your own home, twice a day, is all that is necessary to counteract eyestrain and headache, and relegate eyeglasses to the rubbish box. Throw away your eyeglasses. See nature, and read with your naked eyes. Write for instructive booklet and 15 days test to THE IDEAL CO., 321 H 5th Ave., N.Y.

THE APOSTLES IMPRISONED

By Mrs. M. Baxter

WHEN the tide of life and power rose high in the primitive Church, when "multitudes" were added to the Lord, and all the sick who were brought to the disciples were healed, "the powers that be" took alarm. "The high priest rose up, and all they that were with him (which is the sect of the Sadducees), and were filled with indignation, and laid their hands on the apostles, and put them in the common prison." What had they done? Only preached and healed. Had sin increased? Could they prove that those who were "added to the Lord" were the worse for it? Was it a sin to bring sick people in contact with their Lord by faith, so that he delivered them from their pains and from their uselessness? Had the conversions been effected by the priests, would they not have gloried in them? Had the healings been wrought through the instrumentality of some physician of those days, would he not have been looked upon as a benefactor of mankind?

The apostles' term of imprisonment was not long. "The angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and brought them forth, and said, 'Go, stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life.'" But, so doing, would they not act in open defiance of the authorities? The authorities were acting in defiance of God. The apostles had made no resistance whatever when they cast them into prison; their cause was the cause of God, and they could safely "commit the keeping of their souls (Gr. "lives") to him in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator" (I. Pet. 4:19). Praise God! no prison locks can retain his children a moment longer than he permits; Jesus had guaranteed to his followers, "Nothing shall by any means hurt you" (Luke 10:19); how could those who believed his words have a moment's anxiety? They left the prison, passing, as they went, the keepers, who knew not that God has a private latchkey to every door, and has sedatives of his own for any prison-keeper. The men of God lost no time, but went early in the morning into the temple, and taught. Those who know what it is to win souls, to see them pass "from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God," can well conceive with what joy the liberated disciples bore again their testimony for Jesus.

Others were at work as well as they, but on a far different mission; "the high priest came, and they that were with him, and called the council together, and all the senate of the children of Israel"—church and state, rulers ecclesiastical and secular, combining against Jesus! They sent to the prison, summoning the accused parties to appear before them. The officers, the police of those days, returned with an inexplicable story: "The prison truly found we shut with all safety, and the keepers standing without before the doors; but when we had opened, we found no man within." What was this? Was there a traitor in their own camp? Before they had recovered from their surprise, the report reached them that their prisoners were not only at liberty, but absolutely preaching the Gospel again, and that, not hidden away in some obscure place, but openly in the temple. They lost no time, but sent immediately to take them, not with violence, for they feared an uprising of the people in their defense, and that the officers would be stoned. The apostles made no resistance, but stood unabashed before the council. Peter and the other apostles, just filled with fresh confidence, fresh praise, fresh experience of the mighty power of God's delivering hand, were not likely to be awed by any company of men, however august. They did not merely make a statement of doctrine, they gave personal testimony; and so must every one do who would have power with others; it may rouse their anger, or it may convict them; whenever it is real, it will not be without effect. These rulers were "cut to the heart," but pride would not allow them to yield. Brought up to such a point, men must either yield or become persecutors; these men chose the latter, and in their mad rage "took counsel to slay them." But there was one man there—Paul's schoolmaster (Acts 22:3), "a Pharisee named Gamaliel, a doctor of law, had in reputation among all the people," who stood forth as their advocate.

Poultry Secrets Disclosed

This heaping bushel of winter egg-producing green feed cost 17 cts. "Poultry Secrets" explains fully this secret and many others.

EVERY successful poultryman knows important facts he never tells. They are peculiar secret methods and discoveries he has made in his work with chickens. As a rule he guards these with extreme care for they are the foundation of his success and a valuable asset of his business. He is not to be blamed for keeping them to himself.

We Will Tell You These Secrets which have cost poultrymen years of labor and thousands of dollars. They will cost YOU only a trifle and a few minutes' time to write us.

There is no man in the United States who has more friends among poultrymen than Michael K. Boyer. A veteran chicken breeder himself, he knows the business from A to Z, and through his wide acquaintance and friendship he has learned many of their most jealously-treasured secrets. This scattered material he has collected in book form, and we are offering it to the poultry raisers of America that they may share in the knowledge which these successful men have acquired by long years of study and bitter experience. Every secret printed in this book has been obtained in an honorable way, either by permission of the owner or through Mr. Boyer's own experience.

I. K. Felch's Mating Secret

One of the best-known figures in the poultry world is I. K. Felch. Many years ago Mr. Felch published his breeding chart, but later, realizing its value, he withdrew it and kept the information for himself. He has now given Mr. Boyer permission to use this information, and it is included in this book.

Secret of Fertile Eggs

Boyer's secret of securing fertile eggs by alternating males we believe is worth $100 to any producer of setting eggs. It is something new, and the diagrammatic illustration furnished by Mr. Boyer makes the matter so plain that the novice can easily understand it.

The Secret of Feed at 15 cents a Bushel

An enterprising poultryman has been advertising this secret for $5.00 and pledging those who buy it not to disclose it to any one else; it has, however, long been known to a few poultrymen, Mr. Boyer among them, and the method is fully explained in "Poultry Secrets."

We Are Willing to Name Here Some of the Secrets

1. Burnham's secret of mating fowls.
2. Felch's method of breeding from an original pair, producing thousands of chicks and three distinct strains.
3. Mendel's Chart of Heredity.
4. Secret of strong fertility by alternating males.
5. Secret of knowing what to feed and how to feed it. The secret of having green food in winter.
6. Secret of sprouting oats and barley for poultry feeding.
7. Secret recipes for chick feed; practically the same feed is now sold on the market at a high rate.
8. Secret of fatting poultry economically so as to make the most profit out of the crop.
9. Secret of telling the laying hens of the flock.
10. Secret of detecting age in stock.
11. Secret of knowing how to judge dressed poultry.
12. The only safe way of preserving eggs.
13. A secret of dressing fowls so as to do the work quickly and thoroughly.
14. An exposure of the methods employed by some fanciers to kill the fertility of the eggs.
15. The winter egg crop and how to get it.
16. Fatting turkeys for market.
17. Hunter's Secret of Success.
18. Secret of the Philo System.

There Are Scores of Others

Selecting the Laying Hens

Since the production of eggs is the very basis of the poultry industry, the ability to tell the laying hens in the flock without the aid of trap nests will put dollars in your pocket. Do not keep on feeding the robber hens. It is well known that some hens never lay an egg, while others often not as good looking produce

200 Eggs a Year

Of course we cannot go to the length of saying that all the information in the book is new to every one. It is said there is nothing new under the sun, and the Egyptians were hatching eggs by artificial heat centuries ago; but we do say that to the great majority of poultrymen these secrets are absolutely unknown.

We Will Pay $10.00 For Any Secret Not in the Book provided it is practical and valuable. If it is something both good and new, a check for Ten Dollars will be sent at once. In submitting secrets address all communications to the

Poultry Department of Farm Journal

FARM JOURNAL for thirty years has conducted a poultry department known the country over for the ability of its editors and the value of its contents. It is the standard farm and home paper of the country, with three million readers. It is clean, bright, intensely practical; boiled-down; cream, not skim milk. Its contributors know what they are talking about and can quit when they have said it. Besides its unusually strong poultry section, which of itself makes the paper valuable to every chicken owner, its other departments are ably conducted and widely quoted. It is for the gardener, fruit man, stockman, trucker, farmer, villager, suburbanite, the women folks, the boys and girls. It is worth far more than the price asked for it and "Poultry Secrets" together. Its more than half million subscribers pay five and ten years ahead—a very remarkable fact.

We will send you a copy of "Poultry Secrets" and "Farm Journal" for 5 years, both for Only $1.00

OUR MAIL-BAG

Questions and Answers

M. M. W., Cumberland, O. Where was Edgar Allan Poe buried?

Poe died in Baltimore, Md.. in 1849, and was buried there. Quite an elaborate monument, with his bust on the side, now marks the poet's grave. The monument was secured through the efforts of the school teachers of the city, and dedicated March 17, 1875, in the presence of a large concourse of people. We are unable to answer the second question you sent.

S. M., Dayton, O. I read in a recent issue of THE MAIL-BAG a statement as to the various calculations concerning the location of the Garden of Eden. Has not some one more daring than the others claimed that it was in the Polar regions?

Several have done so, the latest being Rev. William F. Warren, who published a book asserting that the cradle of the race was at the North Pole. His theory is that the earliest habitable portions of the slowly cooling globe, in the ages immediately after creation, must have been those portions nearest the poles; that the fossil flora and fauna found in these regions to-day show that they were at one time tropical and that geological science shows that the earliest spread of vegetable and animal species proceeded from that centre which was within the Arctic circle. Of course, Mr. Warren has supporters. Meanwhile, the preponderance of scholarship and research points to a location immediately north of the Persian Gulf, where the four great rivers of Gen. 2:11-14 are apparently identifiable.

S. E. H., Milton, Ky. Does magnetic attraction from the north star cause the ellipse of our planets?

No. All of the planets revolve in elliptical orbits, in which the sun occupies one of the foci. The elongated ends of the orbits may or may not be directed towards the Polar Star. That star has no influence in determining the shape of the orbits. SAMUEL PHELPS LELAND.

W. H. C., Kingston, Okla. Who are the two witnesses spoken of in Rev. 11:3?

The passage means "two anointed ones." As God in early days raised up Joshua and Zerubbabel, who ministered to the Jewish church; so, in later times, he will raise up two inspired witnesses to minister encouragement to the afflicted remnant of the faithful. Some interpret it to mean that Moses and Elijah may reappear. Many of the early church believed the reference was to Enoch and Elijah.

C. G. B., Selbyville, Del. 1. Does it come into any conflict whatever with what the Bible teaches, for us to believe that the head of our race, Adam, was created 100,000 years ago? 2. Does it come into any conflict whatever with what the Bible teaches, for us to believe that there was a race inhabiting the earth at and before the time of Adam's creation, and that the same was in existence 100,000 years or more, and that Gen. 14:5, R.V.; Deut. 2:20, 21; 3:11 A.V. and R.V., refer to this race?

1. The Bible simply says, "In the beginning;" it gives not even an approximate date either for the creation of the world or of the human race. Geologists and speculative theologists differ materially in their estimates of the age of the race. The chronology found in most Bibles is by Archbishop Ussher, and is not a part of the Bible itself.

2. Nothing is known of a race before Adam, although ethnologists generally agree that there was one. Such a belief, though largely speculative, would not conflict with Bible teaching, as several passages in the Bible are interpreted to refer to a lower order of pre-Adamite aborigines.

W. W., Westmashannon, Pa. What color were the three wise men of the East and from what country did they come?

Tradition tells us they came from Arabia and that their names were Caspar, Melchior and Baltasar. The natives of that country are of an olive complexion.

N. F. B., Bahamas. Please tell me, through the columns of THE MAIL-BAG, what qualifications make a gentleman?

In America, a man who is considerate of others; who is of cultivated mind; interested in all that tends to elevate life and thought, is considered a true gentleman. In England, more stress is laid on a man's birth, and he is considered a gentleman if he comes of gentle blood, and possesses good manners.

S. N., Huntsville, Ark. Where is the Ark of the Covenant and its contents—Aaron's rod, the Tables of Stone and Pot of Manna? If not in existence, what became of them?

The whereabouts of the Ark of the Covenant, with its precious contents, is one of the unsolved mysteries of the Jewish race. Some hold that it is in a secret place, which will be revealed at the proper time, in accordance with God's will. Others believe it to have been destroyed by some one of the invading nations which despoiled Jerusalem. There are some who believe it to be hidden in the great underground galleries below the temple area. It is all conjecture, however. No one can speak authoritatively on the subject.

S. B. N., Ridgeville, Md. Where was the first sin committed?

See Genesis, third chapter. Your other inquiry as to the origin of evil is a great problem, which cannot be solved by human intelligence. It is permitted in the world, no doubt, as a part of man's discipline.

Mary T. S., Chilhowee, Mo. 1. When was Peter converted? 2. Do we understand that there are people to-day unconverted, yet working and gathering together for the Lord's kingdom? 3. How may we receive this strengthening conversion? 4. Does the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the disciples at Jerusalem mean this conversion, or, as we hear now, Pentecostal blessing and power? 5. Who was Cadmus?

1. At the time when he was called by Jesus, although there were indications of occasional relapses, when his rock-like faith was partially obscured. 2. There are doubtless many who, although not professing Christians, are leading good, moral lives and are so "near to the kingdom" that they may be said to contribute in a sense to its extension. 3. By prayer, by repentance of our sins, by sincerely accepting Christ as Saviour, by surrendering ourselves to him in all things as our guide, and by proclaiming our new allegiance and striving, with his help and in his strength, to regulate our lives according to his teachings. Conversion is a turning from sin to righteousness, producing

London's Welcome to the Suffragettes on Their Release from Jail

Upon the release from jail of Mrs. Pankhurst, her daughter and the other suffrage agitators who were implicated in the recent disturbances, the friends of the "Violent Sisterhood" prepared a public demonstration in their honor. They were driven through some of the streets of London in vehicles drawn by white horses, while others rode horseback. Great good-humored crowds filled the thoroughfares and police guarded the little procession, which carried banners and flags.

thus a change in our thoughts, desires, dispositions and daily lives, which is the work of the Holy Spirit upon the heart as the result of saving faith. Conversion, however, in the sense of turning from sin and accepting Christ as Saviour, is distinct from regeneration, which is the work of the Spirit only. 4. The disciples were already converted men; the Pentecostal visitation was a special blessing or enduement of spiritual power, which had been promised. 5. Cadmus was a Phœnician, who is said by tradition to have introduced the alphabet into Greece, or, in other words, taught them Phœnician writing.

Subscriber, Florida. What relation are the children of a first cousin (my first cousin) to my children?

They are second cousins.

Mrs. J. H., East Liverpool, O. Of what denomination was Jesus?

There were no denominations among the Jews as we understand them, although there were various religious sects, including the Scribes, the Pharisees, the Sadducees, the Essenes, the Zealots, and the Nazarites. There is no evidence that Jesus held the particular doctrines of any of these sects, although John the Baptist and the Apostle James, according to tradition, were Nazarites, and Paul is said to have become a Nazarite at one period of his career.

G. T. J., Bozeman, Mont. What does the liquor traffic cost the people of the United States?

In 1907 the nation's liquor bill was $2,200,000,000.

C. L., Iowa. What was the cost of each State capitol building of the United States, and the National Capitol at Washington, D. C.?

You can get the cost of the various capitol buildings by addressing the Secretary of State in each State. There is no general record. The Capitol at Washington, D. C. cost about sixteen million dollars. The Capitol building of the State of New York at Albany, N. Y., the most costly capitol in the country, cost over twenty-five million dollars.

J. H. N., Carmel, N. Y. Is the language of the province of the Béarn, France, anything like French, or more like Spanish?

The population of Béarn is mainly of Basque origin, with a certain mixture of Greek blood from the old Greek colonies. The old Basque language is still generally spoken despite a large infusion of French. Traces of old Hellenic names are frequently found. The Basque language is spoken on both sides of the French-Spanish boundary, by 600,000 people. It cannot be classed with any Semitic or Indo-European language, but is of earlier origin. It has some grammatical analogues to some Mongol, East African and North American languages. It is made to express, by extensive suffixes, all the ordinary declensions and conjugations. The foreign words are easily assimilated.

Rev. John H. Fazel, evangelist, Topeka, Kan., sends this New Year greeting to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

> Come again for another year,
> For we cannot do without you;
> And go again to friends so dear,
> Who'll be glad to know about you.

S. D., Petoskey, Mich. Can you tell me when, and by whom, the months of the year and the days of the week were first arranged?

The system of dividing the year into twelve months seems to have heen known to some of the Eastern nations from very early times. The Roman calendar of Julius Cæsar was based on the solar year, which was supposed to be 365¼ days long. The names of the months and the number of the days in each were the same, with a few alterations made by the Emperor Augustus, as they are at present in our calendar. The days were named by the Greeks and Romans after their heavenly bodies, and from them have been made the modern names—Saturday after Saturn, Sunday (Sol), Moonday, the moon; Tuesday from Tiu, the Mars of the Saxons; Wednesday from Woden, the equivalent of Mercury; Thursday from Thor, of the Scandinavian races, equivalent to the Roman Jupiter, and Friday from Freya, the Northern equivalent for Venus. In the East, in the astronomy of the Brahmans, the week is divided into seven days, which are named after the same heavenly bodies. The division of the week into seven parts goes back into the earliest days of Hebrew history.

J. B., Victoria, Ill. 1. Where did they get the name Washington, and District of Columbia? 2. Were the presidential candidates nominated by the Republicans and Democrats when Washington was nominated? 3. How many more Repuhlicans are there than Democrats? 4. What is the House of Representatives, and what do they do?

1. The capital city was named in honor of the first President. The district in which it is situated was called Columbia, a name derived from the discoverer of the country, Christopher Columbus. The names were given in 1791, when the commissioners appointed to survey the Federal District agreed to call the district "Territory of Columbia," and the city the city of Washington. 2. No; the Republican and Democratic parties were not then in existence. The entire country called Washington to be the first President, and he received the unanimous vote of the Electoral College. During his administration two parties were formed, the Federalist and Republican (Democratic); this latter was neither the Republican or Democratic parties as we now know them; but he was again the unanimous choice of the electors. 3. It would be difficult to give the exact number of Democrats and Republicans, as there are a large number of independent voters who cast their ballots for candidates or measures they advocate regardless of the candidate's party affiliations. The total number of votes cast for the Republican candidate last fall was 7,061,875; the Democratic candidate received 6,015,160 votes. 4. The House of Representatives is the lower house of Congress. Its members are usually referred to as Congressmen instead of Representatives.

W. V. S., Huntingdon, Pa. What does the word Emmanuel really mean?

Emmanuel or Immanuel means "God with us." It was the name given to the Messiah in prophecy, "and to Jesus Christ in its fulfilment."

W. M. S., Cool Spring, Pa. 1. Did Luke write the whole of the Acts? if not, by whom was it written? 2. Do all other nations date time as we do now, 1909?

1. The authorship of the Acts of the Apostles is generally credited to Luke, who accompanied Paul to Rome, and probably became the historian of his journeys. There is no positive, but very strong, presumptive evidence to this effect, which most commentators accept as conclusive. 2. No. Greece and the Balkan States retain the old Dionysian or Greek calendar (which Russia officially discarded in 1902, in favor of the New Style). The Hebrews, in their religious and private relations, use the ancient Jewish calendar, and the Chinese, Japanese and Koreans have still another calendar, which is based upon the dates of certain dynasties.

The Cry of Italy

I

HARK the cry around the world!
See the flags of woe unfurled!
Feel the spears of horror hurled!
Help for Italy!

Who are ye who sit at ease
Under golden-fruited trees,
Fanned by fortune's favorous breeze?
Help for Italy!

Wealth is yours to hoard or use;
Life is yours to save or lose;
Heaven is yours to spurn or choose;
Help for Italy!

II

Hark the answer thundered back
Cross the blasting earthquake's track:
"Gold is Love's and none shall lack—Gold for Italy!"

Pity stirs in every breath;
"List!" the brothering ocean saith;
"Life is Love's to conquer Death—Life for Italy!"

Kindness flies on eager wing;
Lo, the attending angels sing:
"Prayer is Love's to storm the King—Prayer for Italy!"

DIDN'T KNOW

Coffee Was the Cause.

Many daily habits, particularly of eating and drinking, are formed by following our elders.

In this way ill health is often fastened upon children. A Ga. lady says:

"I had been allowed to drink coffee ever since I can remember, but even as a child I had a weak stomach which frequently refused to retain food.

"The taste of coffee was in my mouth all the time and was, as I found out later, the cause of the stomach rebelling against food.

"I now see that it was only from following the example of my elders that I formed and continued the miserable habit of drinking coffee. My digestion remained poor, nerves unstrung, frejuent headache, and yet I did not suspect the true cause.

"Another trouble was a bad, muddy complexion for which I spent time and money for creams, massaging, etc., without any results.

"After I was married I was asked to try Postum, and would you believe it, I an old coffee toper, took to Postum from the very first. We made it right—according to directions on the pkg. and it had a most delicate flavour and I at once quit coffee, with the happiest results.

"I now have a perfectly clear, smooth skin, fine digestion and haven't had a headache in over two years."

"There's a Reason."

"3-in-One" makes any sewing machine run easy and light.

It penetrates the working parts, lubricating every action point just right, making any machine run easy and light. No "hard pumping" to break a woman's back if "3-in-One" is used generously.

"3-in-One" will bring back to life and usefulness many an old apparently worn out machine. And it adds years to the life of any new machine. Cleans and polishes the woodwork, lightens and prevents rust and tarnish on all metal parts.

Sewing Machine Oil

To clean machine thoroughly take shuttle and needle out and liberally all parts with "3-in-One" and run at a high rate of speed. This cuts out the gum and dirt and old sticky oil. Then wipe all parts carefully and put "3-in-One" on all action points as a lubricant. Can be cleaned and oiled today and run six months later as gum and dirt will not mix with "3-in-One" won't dry out. Ordinary oils do in less than a week.

The Nearness of God*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THIS week's text needs a brief explanation. "High priest rose up." This expresses the determination of the high priest to punish the apostles, who from his point of view were sowing the seeds of blasphemy and dissension. He went about it in an excited, spectacular way, with loud voice, violent manner and passion.

"The Sadducees were filled with jealousy." They were jealous of the new movement — Christianity — because it taught resurrection from the dead, which had no part in their creed.

"The apostles." Probably all of them who were found in Solomon's Porch preaching the Gospel and healing the sick.

"In public ward." The public prison, not as a punishment, but to keep them for trial.

"An angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and brought them out." It may have been the Jehovah angel; then it was a theophany of Christ. (See Dan. 3:24-26.)

"Go ye, and stand, and speak in the temple" the Gospel message, "the words of this life." And they went immediately; it was about daybreak. People were already at the temple. It was their custom to engage in worship before the sun should appear above Olivet.

"Called the council together," the Sanhedrin called by the high priest. Then they sent for their prisoners, not having heard that they had escaped, and were preaching in the temple. This would seem to indicate that the court room was no longer adjacent to the temple.

"Found them not." Even the keepers had not discovered the escape of the apostles until they went into the prison to deliver them to the officers of the high priest (the Levitical Guard).

The Apostles Before the Council

"Then went the captain with the officers and brought them without violence." They had been informed by a messenger that the apostles were in the temple, preaching to the people. They did not dare to lay violent hands on them, for fear the people would stone them.

"They set them before the council," which was composed of seventy-two members, sitting in a semi-circle. The apostles were placed in the midst, face to face with those supposed to be the wisest men in all Israel.

"We strictly charged you not to teach in this name." They might as consistently have said, "We charged the sun not to shine, nor the rain to fall."

"You will bring this man's blood upon us." They had previously taken Christ's blood upon themselves before Pilate (Matt. 27:25).

"We must obey God rather than man." The high note of courage sounded by Peter and all of the apostles was a repetition of what had been said before, in substance, to the Sanhedrin (Acts 4:19).

"Jesus, whom ye slew, hanging on a tree." Crucifixion was so described among the Jews, to make such a form of death seem all the more accursed.

"A Prince and Saviour." The apostles declared Jesus to have been so exalted by Jehovah.

"We are witnesses of these things"—of the power of Jesus to save the lost, heal the sick, raise the dead to life, having been eye witnesses.

"And so is the Holy Spirit." The members of the council could not have been unaware of how Jerusalem was shaken when the Holy Spirit descended upon those who waited in the upper room.

The Providence of God

There are two lines of thought furnished by this incident, both of which challenge our attention and study: The providence of God, and the courage of conviction shown by the apostles. As the latter was commented upon in connection with the trial of Peter and John before the Sanhedrin we will confine ourselves to the first topic, the providence of God.

We are fully aware that the planetary system moves according to the will and plan of God; just as surely do human affairs. Dr. Parker has said: "Every movement of Christ is a fulfilment of prophecy, and could we see God's purposes concerning ourselves we should see that he fixes the bounds of our habitations. Wherever in the sacred records we find a statement of details, we discover that they are set forth as a part of a plan; and so it is all through human life. Could we but see the book that is on high, we should find that we move hither and thither "that it might be fulfilled." Viewed in this light everything that occurs to us may be considered "providential." God knew just what was going to happen to us, and it was his purpose to be there at the time to give us relief and comfort. Surely the apostles being put in ward was not the unexpected that happened, requiring a sudden movement on the part of God to counteract.

Another court scene, one belonging to our day, is described in the following story which was related by a well-known clergyman:

"A dear friend of mine, Dr. John McClintock, had been indicted on a charge which grew out of the escape of an alleged fugitive slave, and the case attracted general attention.

"Pending the trial, a Mr. Jacob Rheem, whom I well knew, and who is still living, was told that a conspiracy existed to secure the conviction of Dr. McClintock, and the conversation of the conspirators was narrated to him by one who had overheard them. This fact, if established, would end the case; but, unfortunately, Mr. Rheem could not remember the name of the man who had given him the information, and so the case was imperiled. Every care was taken by Mr. Rheem to recall each event of the day when he gained the valuable knowledge, but it was all in vain; his mind was perfectly blank as to the party, and so remained until the trial was begun. He was put on the witness-stand, still unable to remember.

The Corroboration of the Stranger

"He gave the conversation as detailed to him; and when asked to name his authority spoke not a word, but cast his eye first up to the roof, and then around the court room, till, as it was fixed upon the entrance, he suddenly sprang almost into the air, as he pointed his finger at a man just coming in, and said, "There he is! That's the man!" On being called to the stand, the stranger corroborated Rheem in every particular, and stated that he was a countryman living miles out of Carlisle, and had not been in the town since the day he had told Rheem of what he had heard, and had come in that day knowing nothing about the trial, not suspecting that he was wanted, and had merely strolled into the court house without motive, except to gratify an idle curiosity, and "see what was up." Hon. William Meredith, of Philadelphia, one of Dr. McClintock's counsel, when he told the story, as he often did, always closed by saying, 'After that, gentlemen, I cannot refuse to believe in a special providence.'"

In the words, "All things work together for good to them that love God," we seem to hear the ticking of a great world clock. Thousands of years before man came to the earth, all things were working together to prepare his habitation and supply his future needs. Coal and oil were being prepared for his use. Gold and silver and iron were being stored away for him by a loving Father who knew what man's needs would be. Plant life and animal life were developed in a way to be suited to man. It is easy for us to see the adaptation of God's loving kindness to all our physical needs, but not quite so easy to understand his design in pain and disappointment, which are sometimes our lot.

When the Israelites were on their way to the land of Canaan, there were days of revelation when God allowed men to look behind the face of the universe clock, and see the machinery by which it was working. What we call "miracles" were opportunities for men to see how God works in their behalf. What a glimpse into God's way of working was that given at Dothan to the young man for whom Elisha prayed that God would open his eyes. Elisha prayed thus for him because he was greatly alarmed by the host of Syria, which had surrounded Dothan for the purpose of making Elisha a prisoner. The prayer of Elisha was answered and the young man saw that the mountain was full of horses and that chariots of fire were round about Elisha, and that it was as Elisha had said, the warriors of God were more than the Syrians. Let us ever believe that "the angel of Jehovah encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them [us] (Ps. 34:7).

A Narrow View

It would be sin for us with our powers of soul to be like that fly which Bishop Berkeley saw on the cathedral pillar. "It requires," he says, "some comprehension in the eye of an intelligent spectator to take in at one view the various parts of the building, in order to observe their symmetry and design. But to the fly, whose prospect was confined to a little part of one of the stones of a single pillar, the joint beauty of the whole, or the distinct use of its parts, was inconspicuous. To that limited view the small irregularities on the surface of the hewn stone seemed to be so many deformed rocks and precipices." And Dean Stanley philosophizes on this incident in the following manner:

"That fly on the pillar, of which the bishop spoke, is the likeness of each human being as he creeps along the vast pillars which support the universe. The sorrow which appears to us nothing but a yawning chasm or hideous precipice may turn out to be but the joining or cement which binds together the fragments of our existence into a solid whole! That dark and crooked path in which we have to grope our way in doubt and fear may be but the curve which, in the full daylight of a brighter world, will appear to be the necessary finish of some choice ornament, the inevitable span of some majestic arch!"

A comparison to the fly on the pillar might be made with the drone bee described by Victor Hugo. When first seen he was dashing himself against the window panes to escape from a room. "'My friend,' said I, 'I thought you had more life in you than the others. If I do not come to the rescue, your affairs, too, will soon be finished; before night you will be dead, and when I go upstairs this evening and search for you, light in hand, to see what has become of you, I shall find your little dead body on the floor.' Well, like the Roman Emperor Titus, I wish to mark this day by some benefit conferred on another; let me save the life of this insect! I opened the window, and, with a towel in hand, I drove the drone in that direction, but it always kept flying to the opposite side. Then I tried to catch him by throwing a towel over him. When the drone knew that I wanted to catch him, he completely lost his head; he dashed himself against the panes of glass in a perfect frenzy, as if he wished to break them; he flew about again, then again dashed violently against the glasses, and crossed the whole room in all directions, but, desperate, distracted; it was as if he had said, 'Ah, you wish to take me! Ah, you wish to deprive me of my liberty! Tyrant, despot! Terrible and relentless executioner! Will you not leave me alone at last?' After long efforts I succeeded in knocking him over, and then catching hold of him, through the towel, I involuntarily hurt him a little; oh, how he wished to revenge himself! He thrust out his sting, his nervous little body contracted, gathering itself up to attack me with all the vigor that still remained. But I—without troubling myself in the least about his wrath and his protestations—stretched forth my arm out of the window, and shook the towel I held. The drone, only for one moment giddy and half suffocated, took to his wings, and flew into space. Ah, well, I have saved this drone, I have been to him like a sort of Providence!"

Life Lessons from Job*

THE origin of the book of Job is lost amid the mists of antiquity, but its place in the sacred records and its purpose for the instruction of men have never been doubted. Its enormous human interest is somewhat indicated by the bibliography of its commentators, the mere catalogue of which occupies more than three full columns of fine type in McClintock and Strong's great cyclopedia.

Probably no literary composition in existence has evoked such widely different interpretations as this wonderful book. Whether it was meant to be simply an allegory; whether it is more or less diluted history; or whether it is a narrative, based, perhaps, upon facts, are theories which have had, each in turn, many learned supporters.

Fortunately, these matters are of comparatively slight importance. The main feature of Job's story which concerns us is his wonderful character. He is a saintly man, with fewer faults than most. In spite of the fact that he is the model of all time in patience, he occasionally waxes quite angry with his "comforters." It may have been a righteous anger. Surely none of us could have borne without indignation their sneers and their accusations.

Without exaggeration, it may be said that whatever goodness the races since Job have possessed has been in no small measure due to this marvelous chronicle. The spectacle which it presents of a good man, afflicted almost to death, yet clinging to his faith, must have profoundly influenced ethics and religion wherever this wonderful book was read. Its unequaled poetry; its scientific lore, in which men were told hundreds and probably thousands of years before Galileo, that "God stretcheth out the north over the empty place and hangeth the earth upon nothing"; its intense dramatic interest, and its lofty moral lessons, all combine to make a work of stupendous importance.

Every book in the Bible contains eminently quotable passages, but perhaps that of Job has contributed to the literature of the world more of the "current coin" of high thought and noble expression than any other.

One who reads much would probably pass scarcely a week without encountering some of these striking sentiments or enchanting poetic images as embodied in the works of famous authors. George Matheson is one to whom the Oriental warmth of Job's coloring especially appeals; but he says of the famous passage, "Man is born to trouble, as the sparks fly upward," "I think he must have meant, 'Man is born to fly upward like the sparks, and therefore he is troubled,' for our early dangers come from our early daringness. Young Adam always begins with the biggest tree, and always gets a fall. God's education of the earth is a series of lessons in 'how to descend.'"

Job learned this lesson, and has shown to mankind, as no other has ever done, the beauty of submission.

It is singular that he mentions neither Abraham, Isaac nor Jacob, which fact has led many to believe that he lived before their time; that he seems not to know the features of Palestine, though his views are all Judaic, and "the nether world in his writings is painted in hues entirely Hebrew." The fervor with which he proclaims his intimate communion with God, says one commentator, proves that he must have been an Israelite. Yet he evidently wrote in Arabia. This lesson will accomplish a great purpose if it leads the members of our society to study this remarkable book.

Fields for Christian Service*

AS Americans, there is no work which calls to us more urgently for men and for money than that among the colored people of the South.

The wonderful reduction of the illiteracy among them from practically one hundred per cent. at the close of the war to about forty-five per cent., as indicated by the last census, shows that our nation has, to some extent, realized its duty and risen to the crisis; and it indicates no less that the colored race possesses the capacity to profit by teaching.

The depth of our awful responsibility, the misery of the black race in slavery, and the conviction of their fitness for freedom were grasped by Abraham Lincoln as such broad truths have seldom been mastered by any man since time began.

As time removes him further and further from us, his true value to our nation becomes more and more apparent, and the course of his life is seen, as few can be seen in this confused world, to have been shaped by Providence as clearly as a great highway is devised by a master builder. His birth and upbringing among the very poor, so that he should know, as only experience can teach it, their point of view; his sight, in his impressionable boyhood, of the Southern slave markets; his training in politics, which fitted him for the management of men and the initiation of policies; and his keen instinct, which showed him the psychic moment for the striking of the immortal blow, releasing a captive race from its shackles; all these come out more and more in the fair perspective of time. His faults and his foibles drop away, and the sublimely patient, humble, loving man shows forth like a colossal inspired statue from the hand of an Angelo.

It was said that Mr. Moody came to his great power more slowly than any other of our famous preachers. It was only occasionally during the first years of his ministry that he seemed to move souls in large numbers or to produce a deep impression. His first visit to England, in 1867, attracted, says Dr. Banks, no attention whatever. But shortly after he returned home he heard Henry Moorehouse preach, and it suddenly came to Mr. Moody, through that preaching, that the predominant note in all the divine plan was Christ's love for men.

From that moment he reversed the order of his preaching. Instead of emphasizing God's justice, it was full and running over with God's love to his creatures, and we all know the result.

Thus it was with our great hero. He was full of love for all, but especially for those wretched beings whose degradation and enslavement had touched his boyish heart. To him are largely due our great organizations for the relief and education of the blacks, for his deeds inspired them all. Every one who follows in his footsteps, and helps to elevate these struggling, terribly handicapped people, is by so much a patriot after the order of Abraham Lincoln.

You may ask, as did our most patriotic singer:

How shall I deck my song for the large, sweet soul that has gone? . . .
The sweetest, wisest soul of all my days and lands?

And the answer is, do all that you can to lift up and make strong and pure and happy the race for which, in the wide sense, Abraham Lincoln gave his life.

CHILD SAVED

By Simple Change to Right Food.

When a little human machine (or a large one) goes wrong, nothing is so important as the selection of food which will bring it around again.

"The Doctor, and I also," writes an Ills. woman, "consider that we owe the life of my little four year old niece, to Grape-Nuts food.

"From the time of her birth her stomach was so weak she could not digest milk or any food we could think of, altogether we tried about all the Infant Foods known. The doctor gave me no hope—called the trouble intestinal consumption.

"At 18 months the child could barely sit alone, her body was so weak, and her brain did not seem to be properly developed.

"One day, having some trouble with my stomach, I brought home a package of Grape-Nuts and started to use it. The thought came to me that a very little of the food made soft in some cream might be good for the little one.

"I gave her some Grape-Nuts thus prepared and she soon became so fond of it that she would reach out her little thin hands and cry at the sight of a saucer with a spoon in it.

"She ate Grape-Nuts not only in the morning, but at night also, and since the first has never missed a day. She is now, at four years, a strong, healthy child with a good straight back, fine bones, and firm muscles. Her mind is bright also.

"We stopped all medicine, so we know that it was Grape-Nuts and not medicines that saved her."

Exact Size of Solar Eye Piece

Study the Sun

the great central body of the Solar System; the great attractive force, which holds all other planets in their orbits; the great embodiment of light, which is larger by 900 times than all the planets combined, and which supplies all the planets with energy by its radiance. Our $1.00 Excelsior Telescope will help you in this study, notwithstanding the fact that the Sun is nearly 93 million miles away. Through the Solar Eye Piece you can see the sun as you never saw it before. Not only is the Sun magnified through this Telescope, but the Dark Lens in the Solar Eye Piece robs it of its dazzling effect on you, and you can see the Sun properly.

This is a long, powerful Telescope for terrestrial and celestial use. This Telescope is provided with an adjustable Solar Eye Piece for Sun observations. Every student, male or female, needs this Telescope to study the Sun in eclipses, also the mysterious recurrent Sun spots.

Never before was a Telescope with Solar Eye Piece sold for less than $8.00 or $10.00. This Eye Piece alone is worth more than we charge for the entire Telescope to all who wish to behold the Sun in its tranquil beauty. Remove the Solar Eye Piece Lens, and you have a good practical Telescope for land observations, etc.

MESSRS. KIRTLAND BROS. & CO.

Gentlemen: I had with me on my recent European trip one of your Excelsior Solar Telescopes, with which I had the pleasure of observing an eclipse of the Sun. At the Austrian Tyrol it was almost 80 per cent. concealed. Your Solar Eye Piece is a great thing. Its value to me on this occasion was many times greater than the entire outlay for the Telescope.

Yours truly,
L. S. HENRY.

COUNT CATTLE TWENTY MILES AWAY

I wish all to know how satisfactory the Excelsior Telescope is. Our Farm is on the highest point in the surrounding country, one mile south of the junction of Walnut and Arkansas rivers. From our place we can see with the aid of the Telescope over into the Kansas Indian Reservation nearly 20 miles; count the cattle, and tell a horse from a cow; can see a large ranch 17 miles east that cannot be seen with the naked eye; can see the color and count windows with the Telescope.

Again thanking you all for a square deal, I remain

Yours truly,

Interest him in the study of the planets. Let him experiment with lenses and reflectors. Some genius will harness the sun some day and with his warm rays heat our dwellings and generate the steam that runs our factories. It may be your boy, if he is given a few ideas now to think about.

With the new year will come many new and interesting changes in the Planets, Eclipses, etc. You will need a Telescope to study them.

Using the Eye Piece of an Excelsior Telescope as a Microscope

SUN SPOTS. They are dark patches from 1,000 to 100,000 miles in diameter. They last from a few hours to many months. They are known to be hollow cavities in the photosphere, depressed several hundred miles below the general level. Their canse and the precise theory of their formation are still uncertain. At intervals they are very abundant; then there are periods when they almost vanish. Scientists claim that there is a connection between the spottedness of the Sun's surface and the number and the violence of our electric storms and auroras. How interesting to watch these changes and learn to foretell their effects upon the weather!

HISTORY OF THE TELESCOPE

The Telescope seems to have originated in Holland early in the Seventeenth Century. It is quite certain that prior to 1600 telescopes were unknown. From 1870 to 1890 a considerable number of telescopes were made over 2 feet in diameter. The largest of these was "The Lick" of the Lick Observatory, California, which was 36 inches in diameter and 57 feet long.

Our own Excelsior Telescope was first brought out in 1886, but the Excelsior Telescope of 1907, with its Solar Eye Piece, with 21 years of work, study and improvement, is a far superior instrument to any of our previous models.

MR. C. M. MEDLEY, of Duluth, Minn., who purchased one of these Telescopes, says they are superior to anything he expected; that with it he could discern boats on the Great Lakes at a distance of 5 to 10 miles, and in clear weather he could read the names of steamers and other craft at a distance of one half mile away.

Questions and Answers

R. M., Nashville, Tenn. Will disease germs live in ice for a protracted period, say a month?

Scientists differ on this point. A leading New York physician made several experiments, which showed, as he claimed, that within thirty days the water from ice which originally contained bacilli became perfectly pure. Another found bacilli able to recover life and activity after three weeks' freezing. The safest plan is never to use ice which comes from a source liable to infection.

M. E. C., Pittsburg, Pa. What does Matt. 24:15 mean?

"The abomination of desolation," here alluded to, is believed to indicate the Roman ensigns, as the symbols of an idolatrous, pagan power; that power which profaned the Jewish altar (in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes).

Miss Marie B., Scranton, Pa. What are the special features of the latest "simplified spelling" bulletin from the board having the matter in charge?

Bulletin No. 3 proceeds along the same lines of orthographic innovation adopted in the first two bulletins. This new list includes all words containing the letters "ea," which are to be written as short "e." Examples: alredy, bred, brekfast, clense, deden, etc. It also includes words having final "ed," which are to be written with the final "d" alone. Examples: nabd, ribd, sobd, bagd, whizd, clubd, dweld, pend, etc. It includes, further, all words ending in "ice," which are to be written "is." Examples: accomplis, artifis, practis, servis, etc. This last change also applies to such words as noticed (spelled notist), latticed (lattist), jaundiced (jaundist), prejudiced (prejudist), etc. Finally, it includes words ending in "ve," which are to be spelt with the "v" only. Examples: bivalv, delv, involv, solv, valv, selvs, twelv, resolv, carv, nerv, starv, preserv, etc.

B. F., Keokuk, Ia. How do you reconcile I. Sam. 17:49-51 and II. Sam. 21:19 and I. Chron. 20:1?

The first is the story of the killing of Goliath by David. The second passage deals with events many years later, when four of David's great warriors each slew a giant. The third, still later, records the feat of Jonathan. The giant whom Elhanan slew is stated in the same chapter (II. Sam. 21:19 and 22) to have been one of the sons of the Goliath who fell by David's hand. There is no confusion or contradiction, although some superficial critics would make it appear so.

Martin R., Philadelphia, Pa. I see by the papers that a suffrage demonstration, which was to have been held in Brooklyn lately, failed on account of rain. None of the ladies came, all being afraid of getting their feet wet and their hat feathers uncurled by the dampness! What are we coming to? If this kind of women got the suffrage, they would stay at home on election day if it rained (which it often does in November), and the country might go to the dogs. Before they are made voters they should be obliged to pledge themselves to use their privilege, wet or dry.

Our correspondent is, no doubt, misinformed. The fact is, most of the ladies are so ardently in favor of the suffrage that they would go to the polls, even if they had to face a blizzard and had to use skis and ulsters.

Mrs. B. E. S., Constantine, Mich. What are we to understand by the veil of the temple being rent in twain from top to bottom? Matt. 27:51.

It was to signify that by Christ's death and sacrifice the way of access to God had been opened to all. Your other questions already discussed in MAIL-BAG.

Myra D., Dubuque, Ia. How many Catholics are there in the United States?

Some 14,250,000, according to the latest official Catholic estimates. There are 8,200,000 more in the Philippines, Porto Rico and Hawaii, making a total of 22,474,000 Catholics under the American flag. New York City has 1,220,000 Catholics, Chicago 1,150,000, Boston and Brooklyn three-quarters of a million each, New Orleans, Pittsburg and Philadelphia half a million each.

J. H. P., Amsterdam, N. Y. Does the passage of Scripture in II. Tim. 3:16 mean that all Scripture, without exception, is inspired?

This is Paul's advocacy of plenary inspiration, in which he teaches that the whole of the sacred writings are God-inspired, and therefore useful for instruction, etc. There may be degrees of revelation, and even of value, but not of inspiration. Some have attempted a translation of this passage thus: "All Scripture that is God-inspired," thereby implying that some portion is not so inspired; but Paul evidently did not mean it in this sense.

C. E. F., Taylor, Pa. The United States and Germany agreed to an arrangement, effective January 1, 1909, for a 2-cent letter rate between the two countries in the place of the 5-cent rate, when the letters are exchanged by sea direct—that is, by the North German Lloyd and Hamburg-American lines. Letters dispatched by way of Great Britain or France must be paid at the Postal Union rate of 5 cents for the first ounce and 3 cents for each additional ounce. The rate on postals is 2 cents.

A. B. H., Newkirk, Okla. Please explain John 11:25. Are there two distinct promises?

No. Verse 25 shows the operation of the great principle of self-renunciation, which, spiritually interpreted, means self-preservation, and the converse, i. e., self-preservation in the selfish, worldly sense, means spiritual destruction.

Mrs. C. A. C., Winchendon, Mass. 1. There is nothing revealed on the subject beyond what is stated in the Bible, and no one has authority to dogmatize on the matter. 2. The younger the child is at adoption, the more likely it is to give its whole love to its adoptive parent. 3. You might have legal redress against the owner for unpaid taxes, but it is doubtful if you could recover. Ask a lawyer.

Mrs. V. M. C., Ottawa, Kan. What did Jesus mean, when the woman touched him and he said, "I feel that virtue has gone out of me"?

The very presence of Jesus exhaled power and healing (see Luke 6:19, and similar passages). When the multitudes realized this, they pushed their sick to the front to touch him, and they were instantly healed. This was the case with the woman in Luke 8:46. Jesus was conscious of the giving out of his healing power, and although many had pressed close upon him, he distinguished among all others that touch prompted by supreme faith, which had reached forth to have contact with him as a Saviour and Healer. It was the contact through faith which brought the supplicant into sympathy with the Divine pity.

Reader, Frostberg, Pa. In what poem is the line found, "The foolish ofttimes teach the wise," and what is the rest of the sentence?

It is from Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia. The full verse reads:

"The foolish ofttimes teach the wise,
I strain too much this string of life, belike,
Meaning to make such music as shall save."

Stephen Vaudrey, Bedford City, Va., writes: "I see in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 9 that 'The Soldier Preacher,' George Jones, was probably the only eye-witness in America of the siege of Sebastopol. I also was there, and was one of the foremost at the assault of the Malakoff Tower, and obtained Queen Victoria's Crimean medal."

M. T. P., Tennessee City, Tenn. 1. What was the Continental Line? 2. What is the line of demarcation? 3. Why is Russia so much colder than Norway, in the same latitude? 4. What has made the British Isles so wealthy?

1. The Continental Line was made up of what could be called the regular troops of the Revolution, from the various colonies, formed into regiments, serving under officers commissioned by Congress, and were designated by such and such a number of the Continental Line. The other regiments were known either by numbers, followed by the name of the colony from which they came, or by the name of the colonel. 2. The line of demarcation is the boundary line between any two countries, States or Territories. 3. Probably this variation of temperature is due to the fact, in the places where it does occur, that a good part of Norway is surrounded by water, which always modifies the temperature. The greater part of Russia, in the same latitude, is far inland. 4. The British have attained their wealth, as a nation, by always being ready to take up new inventions, in striving to find new markets beyond the seas and encouraging their merchant marine. The main reason back of all this has been the uniform characteristics of the people themselves, who have been unwilling to see other races pass them commercially.

Reader, Newcomerstown, O. Can a pharmacist be a Christian and practise his profession as it is practised to-day? Is the use of drugs non-Christian? Is it wrong to sell patent medicines?

We have no doubt there are many pharmacists who are sincere Christians. While it is true that some may sell nostrums that have no effect upon disease, there are many who refuse to deal in such stuff. The use of drugs is not a question of Christianity, so much as one of ignorance and credulity. Regarding patent medicines, while there may be some that are really serviceable, they are as a whole impositions upon the public. This paper refuses to print such advertisements.

B. McC., Cohoes, N. Y. When was the first dictionary made? Where was the first English dictionary compiled, and who was its author?

It is said that Pa-out-she, a Chinaman, who lived 1100 B. C., compiled a dictionary of the Chinese language, containing 40,060 characters, most of them hieroglyphics. In 1755 Samuel Johnson published his English Dictionary. It was not very large, but showed much research.

R. H., Alabama. There are so many references to the destruction of Pompeii, in connection with the present Italian disaster, that I would like the exact date on which the city was destroyed; also, how many feet deep was it buried? Was there an earthquake at the time?

Pompeii was covered by ashes from an eruption of Mount Vesuvius, on the night of August 24, A. D. 79. The city was covered with a layer of ashes varying from ninety to one hundred and twenty-five feet. There were earth rumblings, but no quake to amount to anything. The city was really lost until 1713, when a countryman, digging a well, found some buildings. Further search was made, and part of the city was uncovered. The first part cleared was supposed to be the main street. The Italian government has at times aided the work of excavation. Get the Last Days of Pompeii, by Bulwer-Lytton. The account of the destruction is based on reliable historic sources. The story is one of the masterpieces.

Revives Old Colonial Days

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I write with a heart filled with gratitude to you for the great pleasure you have bestowed upon me. The delightful book, Inside Story of the White House, reached me in perfect order, and is giving me many pleasant hours in its perusal. It sheds such a refreshing light upon those old colonial times, so rapidly losing their interest upon memory in these rushing days in which we live. With sincere thanks,

An Everyday Delight

Mr. Klopsch, Dear Friend: I sent for your World Famed Stories and Legends thinking it would prove instructive and entertaining for the children on rainy days. WINNING OVER AFRICAN KINGS

By SHIRLEY D. COFFIN

Umtali, Rhodesia

THERE are hundreds of native monarchs in Africa—petty kings who rule in patriarchal fashion over their tribesmen. Some have many thousands of subjects, others comparatively a mere handful; a few have extensive possessions, the majority are only a few degrees better off than the average native. Dealing with these dusky rulers has been one of the most important and delicate problems of missionary work in the "Dark Continent." Usually, a king won over to Christianity means that the open door will be thrown wide to Gospel teaching throughout his dominions.

It has been the good fortune of the workers at the Christian missions in Rhodesia to meet many of these native potentates, and, in very many cases, they have been won over by tact and kindness to give the Gospel a hearing. Not a few among them are now earnest Christians.

This entire section of Africa has been opening wonderfully for missionary work. Umtasa, the most influential native king over a number of surrounding districts in Rhodesia, having become our friend and an ardent advocate of missions, all other kings and chiefs for miles around us have been urgently asking us to send evangelists and teachers to their countries and kraals.

While this has been most encouraging, it has made our situation embarrassing, as means permit the opening of only a few more stations. This circuit has grown, in a year, from seven to twelve stations. Had we the funds, it would number more than twice as many. The gifts THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have sent were applied to the support of a native pastor-teacher and his wife, Daniel Caplen and Mufambiswa, at the Umtasa mission. We have brought them here, it being our central, largest and most important station. On evangelistic tours, Daniel is better fitted to the needs of this place than any of the other workers. He is a native of Blantyre and a leader of unusual ability, as well as a strong and consecrated worker.

The native church has grown to a membership of 164, at old Umtali; Sunday School 167, and class enrolment 175. It is regularly organized, having its own officiary and 13 licensed exhorters, who supply each Sunday at 15 preaching places, kraals in the vicinity and mines or farms where natives are employed. An Epworth League is organized, with 145 members. Each department is at work, and affords excellent training grounds for Africa's future church workers.

Our industrial and agricultural work is also assuming shape. The farm last year yielded over 1,200 bags of meal, also a quantity of fruit and vegetables. A small laundry is in operation, also a blacksmith and carpentry shop. These all contribute to Africa's redemption by preparing the people for greater usefulness, showing a better way to build a house, make a garden, and other things, all of which tends toward their social elevation. The recent arrival and establishment of a printing press is a most valuable addition to the mission equipment.

The first out-station opened from Old Umtali was at Munyarara's kraal, only five miles away. In July, 1905, some young men of this kraal came to us, asking that a teacher be sent to them. The next Sunday we visited the place, held the first service under a tree, saw they were in earnest in their wish and promised to do what we could for them. It was arranged that a young native, teaching in the morning at Old Umtali, should go there afternoons and Sundays. A small chapel was built and work started.

Eight miles from Old Umtali is Shikanga's kraal. A woman of this name is chieftainess. She is a daughter of the old king, Umtasa, who died five years ago. She is a good woman, with large influence over the natives. In the first days of white settlement of Rhodesia, more than one white man, wasted and dying of fever, has been cared for by her and restored to health. Shikanga from the first interested herself in our work, attending every service and urging the same upon her people. During one service at which I was present, Shikanga, in the presence of more than 100 of her people, stood up and stated that she was now done with her old Mashayi "spirit worship." She had learned of the God in heaven, and of his Son, the Saviour, and now she wanted, with her people, to live the Christian way. With that she gave me a club, which she before had carried to invoke the aid of spirits, and also a string of spirit charms, made of deers' horn.

Mandambira's kraal is only four miles away. We visited it and started services on the same day as at Munyarara's. A school and church are now organized and a chapel built. A number have become Christians, one of these being the chief's son. It is our smallest station, yet good work is being done. When we first knew the kraal, it was the popular gathering place for "beer drinks" and debauchery, but is fast becoming a transformed village.

A SERMON BY

Rev. John G. Hallimond*

GOD'S GREATEST GIFT

TEXTS—Rom. 6 : 23; II. Cor. 9 : 15

A GIFT is something that passes from one person to another. It is something given without any expectation of return. It is something that requires positive, distinct, voluntary action on both sides, the giver and the receiver.

Once, when I was traveling in California with a young gentleman friend, we were guests at the home of Mr. Henry French, of San José. Knowing that we were to arrive in a few days' time, while gathering his harvest from his beautiful orchard he gave instructions that one beautiful cherry tree should be left untouched. When we arrived, he told us what he had done, and said: "Now, you may go into the orchard and eat as many cherries as ever you wish from that tree." That was his gift to us. What did we do? Did we fall down on our knees and pray for the cherries to fall into our mouths? Did we propose to Mr. French to work out the value of those cherries? No, the cherries were a gift, and we had no hesitation in going into that orchard and eating those cherries. I have very grave doubts if ever two human beings ate so many cherries at one time as we two fortunate recipients of that gift.

The Life Abundant

Now this is just what is talked about in these New Testament verses. God says: "Here is my Son, Jesus Christ. In him is life, spiritual life, eternal life. He came to give you life, and to give it to you more abundantly (John 10:10). Take him. Receive him. He is my gift." Notice the contrast of this word gift with another word in the same verse. "The wages of sin is death." Wages is something that is earned. If you work in a factory for some one else and on pay day go to the office you receive, not a gift, but the just desert of your labor. The just desert of a sinful life, that which is inevitably earned by wrong doing, is "death," but the gift of God is eternal life.

The gift mentioned in the text is something we do not possess ourselves. It is something which, unless we get it from God, we will never obtain. Life of every kind, and of every degree, is a gift of God. Natural life, the life of the body, is something that comes from God and God alone. Whether it is the result of evolutionary processes or the direct creative act of God, it comes from him and from him alone. There is something about human life that the most daring and enterprising evolutionist cannot dogmatize. He will talk pretty confidently about other things which during the course of ages have been evolved—stars, trees, flowers, beasts and birds—but when he comes to the question of human intelligence, conscience, life, noble sentiments, thrilling emotions, splendid genius, high ideals, the acts and aspirations of the reason, he finds that these are gifts so high and mysterious he has nothing to say, and we can only conclude that they have come direct from the hand of God, from the hand of the great Creator. Because they come from God through Christ, Paul writes, "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift."

What is Eternal Life?

The legend of Prometheus says that it was he who kindled the human soul. Till then man had been a mass of dull, heavy clay, scoffed at by the gods; but Prometheus put into this weak, sluggish creature the celestial spark. Then he began to gaze upon the stars, he was able to weigh worlds, to reap the fruits of the earth, to sail the seas, to understand, govern, prophesy. That is legend. It is no legend that Christ has kindled within us a diviner spark. He makes it possible for us, not only to understand, and calculate, and rule, but he creates within us loving hearts, holy tempers, gracious feelings, truth in the inward parts, holy lives, sacrifice and service.

What is eternal life? It is something quite apart from natural life, the life of the body. It is moral, spiritual, immortal life. Everything in the world to-day, of a moral character, that is good, pure, uplifting, everything that is beneficent in character and reforming and transforming in power, is from God through Christ. The impulses and energies that have built our hospitals and asylums; that have disseminated good, upbuilding literature, illuminated the world with the beauties of art and uplifted the world by the devices of science, all come from God through Christ. They are his gift.

I have heard that in the West Indies there is a peculiar plant known as the life-plant, because it is impossible to kill it, or any portion of it. The leaves of this plant cut off and hung up by a string, instead of shriveling up and dying like other leaves, send out white, thread-like roots, which gather moisture and begin to grow again. Christianity is the life-plant of the moral and spiritual world. When Christ, the spirit and life of Christ, is in a man, you cannot kill him. He is alive for evermore. They flung the early Christians to the hungry lions of the arena, and the lions devoured them until nothing was left but the white, bleached bones. They destroyed the body, but they did not kill the Christians. All their influence lived on, and they are alive to-day. In the days of the martyrs, the fierce flames destroyed the body until nothing was left but a heap of ashes. But the "noble army of martyrs" is alive to-day. Their life is immortal.

The eternal life mentioned in the text is the same life which will ultimately be lived in heaven. When a man accepts Christ he begins to live that life here and now, only it is in its childhood stage. It is nourished here. Food is found for it here. It is trained here. It is not to be wondered at that weak and feeble man makes mistakes, and even commits sins, for he is only a spiritual child, but it does not follow that a man does not possess eternal life because he makes mistakes. There are lots of men who get unnecessarily discouraged when they do wrong. It is a sin for which they will have to ask forgiveness, but they must not conclude, because they have momentarily yielded to temptation, that the flame of spiritual life has been extinguished.

The Human Transformation

Sir Walter Scott, in his Autobiography, tells of the fact that when he was a child one of his legs became partially paralyzed. Medical skill failed to improve it. But a kind-hearted uncle, taking a great interest in the child, spent much time endeavoring to induce him to use the muscles of the leg by drawing a gold watch along the carpet in front of him. The child reached for the watch, and gradually increased the muscular force, and finally perfected the vital action of the limb. God gives to us eternal life, but we are children; we sometimes do not know how to use the gifts, and he trains us, disciplines us by holding out pleasures before us, and we slowly acquire spiritual strength until, by and by, we become perfectly fitted for the fuller and ampler employments of the heavenly life.

You see in some men something that others do not possess. You see something in some men that they themselves did not possess a few weeks or months or years ago. You see men who, five, ten, fifteen years ago, were utterly different men from what they are to-day. Different in heart, in motives, in life, in appearance. What is that something that has come to these men? It is the gift of God, eternal life. You see some men who are loving, affectionate, dutiful, courteous, honorable, but there is a peculiar tone or color missing in their life, which you observe in other men who are not naturally so gifted. That something is not education, for you will often find it in a totally uneducated man and absent in the personality of a cultured professor. What is it? It is something that comes from the reception of God's gift, eternal life.

Mr. Beecher used to talk about a wild colt. He said you could put whatever harness you liked on a wild colt—a harness of gold, or silver, or velvet—he would be a wild colt still. The horse is mightier than the harness. Human nature is like a wild ass' colt. It is not anything from the outside that needs touching up. It is the spirit of God, the life of God, that is needed within.

Eternal life has nothing to do with the intellect. Reason is one of God's greatest gifts to the natural man, but eternal life is something higher than reason. We instinctively feel that there are needs in our personalities that are infinitely more pressing than the mere demands of intellect or reason. Our affections, enthusiasms, imaginations, weaknesses, sins, sorrows, all cry out for something which the finest intellect that ever soared among the stars could never supply. But God can and does supply those needs through Christ. Intellect is nothing without life. Voltaire, one of the most brilliant of men, the idol of the French nation, who were decreeing new honors for him and surrounding him with fresh applause, when his end came, found intellect all in vain in supplying the needs of the eternal part of his nature. On his dying bed, he said: "Doctor, I will give you half of what I am worth for six months." The reply was: "Sir, you cannot live six weeks." "Then," said the dying man, in utter despair, "I shall go to hell, and you will go with me."

A Worthless Freedom

We talk of freedom, but what is freedom without life? I read of a bird that escaped from a cage coming across the ocean. It flew away with outstretched wings over the pathless waste of waters, rejoicing in its new-found liberty. Oh, how sweet was freedom! But after many hours it came back on straggling, heavy wings, and fell panting and breathless on the deck of the ship again. Its freedom had been worth nothing to it when it had not the means whereby to live. So lots of you men have rejoiced for a time in the freedom from restraint. When you left the old home, and found yourself released from the checks that your wise old father or mother had placed upon you for a time, you rejoiced. When you left your wife and children, and threw off the burden of restraint that they placed upon you, you felt yourself free, and, for a time, reckless and heartless, you reveled in that freedom. Such freedom is absolutely worthless without God and his spirit of love in your heart.

Now this is the conclusion of the whole matter: You may be physically strong, naturally healthy, socially powerful, intellectually magnificent, and yet there will be an aching and a void which only God can fill. The late Dr. C. A. Berry, of England, once made use of a very powerful sentence. He said: "It is possible to be intellectually great, ethically enthusiastic, and spiritually dead."

The Appealing Question

Lastly, the question is: Will you take the gift? Jesus Christ, the divine Son of God, said: "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life" (John 4:36). He hath everlasting life, both the germ of it in his nature and the title to it in God's promise. Napoleon Bonaparte was once reviewing his troops in the city of Paris. He sat on his beautiful horse, and had idly let the reins fall on the charger's neck. Something happened which frightened the horse, and he darted off before the reins could be recovered. Quickly recognizing the peril of his great master, a soldier of the ranks sprang forward, caught the reins, stopped the horse and handed the bridle to Napoleon. "I am much obliged to you, captain," said Napoleon. Captain? Why, the man was only a private in the ranks. But Napoleon said "captain." The man was quick, and noticed the word and the emphasis put on it. He believed, and without a moment's hesitation asked, "Of what regiment, sire?" Napoleon, delighted at the quick perception of the man, replied, "Of my guards," and rode away. As soon as the Emperor left, the man laid down his gun and said, "Whoever will may take it." He returned, not to the ranks of private soldiers, but to the staff officers' quarters. They were amazed at his apparent rudeness. One general said, "What does this fellow want here?" The man heard it and said, "This fellow is a captain of the Emperor's guards." They laughed at him, and the general replied, "Why, you are a madman to surmise such a thing." Pointing to the vanishing figure of Napoleon, the man, with flashing eyes and resonant voice, cried out, "He said it, he said it." The staff officers apologized, and the man came to his proper place as captain of the guards.

Jesus Christ says: "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life." There is a poor, tottering tramp in this hall this morning who hears the word and believes. His eyes flash with the light of a new life. His head is lifted. His frame quivers with a new hope. The devil laughs at him. The man next to him says: "You fool, sit down. That message is not for you." The man keeps his eyes upon Christ and replies: "He said it, he said it. He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life."

HELPING CRIPPLES TO SELF-SUPPORT

General View of the Widener Home Buildings

"WISH I wuz a cripple, to live in a place like that," commented a tattered urchin, whose head protruded between the wrought-iron fence of the magnificent home for halt or maimed juveniles that has been established in Philadelphia by P. A. B. Widener, the traction millionaire. The home is one of the show places of the Quaker City. Mr. Widener pays all the bills, and there is no occasion to solicit contributions for this home. For that reason, little is heard of it outside of Philadelphia.

All that is done in the home will tend to the equipment of the boys and girls for the battle of life. Both sexes are to be taught trades and occupations suitable to their condition. If a boy can use his hands, he will be given his choice of any of the trades that he can undertake without being handicapped by his crippled condition. A boy who has lost a leg will not be taught paper hanging or brick-laying, but such a boy can make a good carpenter or worker at any one of the trades where the toiler can sit to work. A girl with a crooked spine may not be unfitted for the business of making artificial flowers, although she could not join the horticultural classes and plant seeds, and water and care for the budding plants.

The plan of the home, as outlined by Mr. Widener, is to make the boys and girls support themselves as soon as possible. With this object in view, the superintendent makes a special study of each individual case and trains that particular boy or girl to do just the work that will enable him or her to earn money while still at the home. As soon as the earning capacity is reached the money so earned is set aside to pay for the board and lodging of the inmate, and anything over that is placed to the credit of the worker to be handed to the boy or girl when the time arrives for leaving the institution and beginning life in the great world beyond the gates.

It appears further that the business of accumulating millions has not prevented Mr. Widener from considering a much discussed difficulty in the child life of homes of this kind. "What is home without a mother?" seems to have been in Mr. Widener's thoughts. Children brought up in "homes" of this kind sometimes droop and die for lack of the personal attention of a motherly woman. Mr. Widener has provided against this contingency by appointing a number of matrons, so many to each separate group of children. Each matron will be "mother" to the group under her charge, and will be expected to watch over and care for the children with as much solicitude as though they were her own.

The buildings in which this splendid charity has its birth are modeled after the Georgian period of English Renaissance, much like the American Colonial style. The group is about 400 feet square, the main building being 265 feet long by 90 feet wide, with subsidiary buildings on the north and south. In the basement is a kitchen 26 feet by 58 feet, equipped with all the conveniences of a modern hotel outfit. At the other end of the basement is a gymnasium, 25 by 50 feet, dressing rooms, bath rooms and well lighted winter play rooms.

At the southern end of the main building is the medical ward and solarium. At the other end are the school assembly room. In the centre are the main hall and staircases, surgeons' room, reception room, diet kitchen, drug store, laboratory and two private wards. On the second floor are three surgical wards, two of sixteen beds each, and a special ward of four beds. On the third floor is the main operating room, sterilizing room, etherizing room and recovery room, surgeons' dressing room, photograph and X-ray room and microscopic and store rooms.

Elevators are provided for carrying the children up and down, and wherever possible inclined planes have been used instead of stairs to lessen the exertion necessary for the crippled children in moving about the building. The subsidiary buildings at either end include the industrial building, educational building and cottages one and two for dormitories; one for boys, the other for girls. The industrial building contains heat, light and power plants for the institution. On the first floor of this building are large and small shops, with instructors' rooms, school rooms, etc. On the second floor are three large work rooms, with their adjuncts. In the educational building are five large and two small class rooms, with instructors' rooms and school rooms. All the buildings are connected so that the children will be under cover while passing from one to the other.

THE DOOR OF BUNYAN'S PRISON

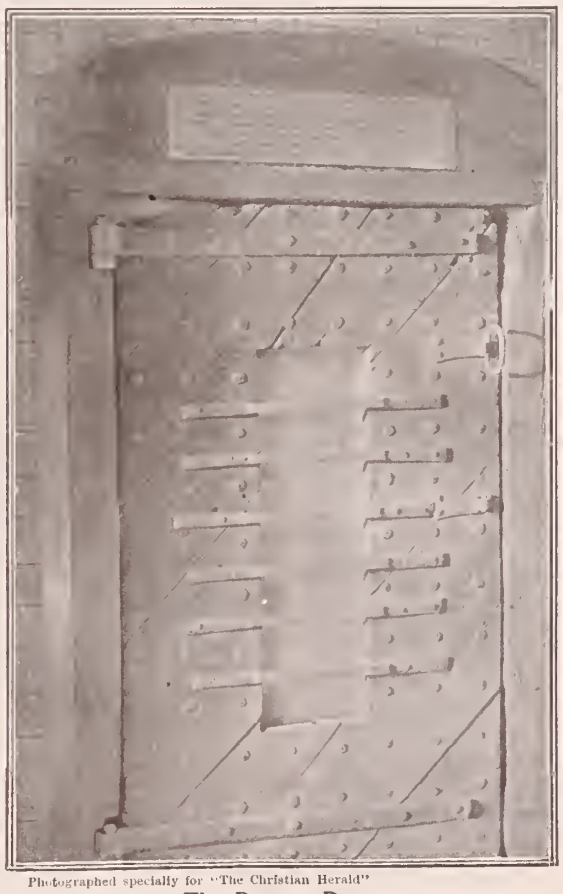
By REV. WILLIAM USHER

ABOUT two and a half centuries ago, Charles II. was placed on the throne of England. Despite previous promises of toleration, he soon decreed that no form of worship could be observed in the land save Episcopacy. The people could not freely assemble for worship, according to the dictates of their own consciences. Only in the Parish, or Episcopal Church, or other building with episcopal sanction and ritual, was it lawful for a congregation to gather for divine service. The right to preach the Gospel and administer the Sacraments was only granted to ministers who had received episcopal ordination.

Under the operation of these oppressive laws, untold hardship was inflicted upon multitudes of conscientious, God-fearing men and women. Some were ruined by heavy fines, others sickened and died in the vile dungeons to which they were committed, while not a few were banished from the land. Among those who at that time suffered for non-conformity was one whose name is known today wherever the English language is spoken—the author of the immortal allegory, Pilgrim's Progress. Brought before Justice Keeling, at the quarter sessions at Bedford, the following charge was brought against him:

> That John Bunyan, of the town of Bedford, laborer, hath devilishly and persistently abstained from coming to church to hear divine service, and is a common upholder of several unlawful meetings and conventicles, to the great disturbance and distraction of the subjects of this kingdom, and contrary to the laws of our Sovereign Lord, the King.

Bunyan acknowledged taking part in separate or non-episcopal gatherings for prayer and exhortation; expressed unwillingness to use the Book of Common Prayer in worship, and emphatically refused to give up preaching, with the result that in 1660 he was sent to prison and remained there almost continuously till the year 1672, when Charles II. issued a declaration of indulgence and Bunyan was set at liberty.



Photographed specially for "The Christian Herald"

The Bunyan Door

Of the county jail in which Bunyan was incarcerated nothing now remains save the door, which in 1885 was presented by the sheriff of the county to the trustees of the meeting house, in Bedford, of which Bunyan was for some years an honored pastor. Above the door is a brass plate, bearing the following inscription:

> This door was originally part of the old County Gaol, at Bedford, in which John Bunyan was confined for twelve years (1660-1672). On the taking down of the prison, in 1801, it came into the possession of Mr. Wm. Berrill, and in 1885 was presented to the Trustees of the Bunyan meeting by T. G. E. ELGER, ESQ., J. P.

The door is of oak, and across an oblong slit therein are several iron bars, through which prisoners could speak to relatives and others visiting the jail. Through the opening in this door Bunyan, no doubt, oftentimes conversed with his wife and children, and handed out the tagged laces, which from time to time he made as a means toward their support. This interesting relic of the past is built into the wall of the church vestry, and securely enclosed within doors, which the courteous janitor was good enough to unlock, and I thus secured the photograph which is here reproduced.

It only remains to be said that the bad laws, which made the gifted and saintly Bunyan an inmate of a common jail for twelve years, are long since repealed, and that in England, as in America, there is liberty of conscience in religious matters; there as here, the prophetic words have met with fulfilment, "They shall sit every man under his own vine and under his figtree, and none shall make them afraid."

THE HOMES OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN

The Humble Log Cottage in Which He Was Born

Abraham Lincoln

The Lincoln Home in Springfield, Ill.

By S. TREVENA JACKSON

An humble roof, plain bed and homely board
More clear untainted pleasures do afford,
Than all the tumult of vain greatness brings
To kings or to the favorites of kings."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S face shows the ascent of a great and serious soul; first, that of a determined boy, then the contending young man, followed by that of the fighter for the reign of right, and at last the mellow, masterly countenance kindled by the fires of love, which will glow through endless ages.

The evolution of Lincoln's home life is a sign of a marked development and rise in the character through its various stages. The Lincoln home life was progressive. It was a steady advance. He knew no retreat; was never satisfied to be stationary; could not live a retrograde; but patiently, powerfully, Lincoln plodded his path and worked his way from the plainest log cabin at Nolin's Creek, Hardin County, Kentucky, to an improved log cabin at Gentryville, Ind.; thence to the north side of the Sangamon River, ten miles from Decatur; then to New Salem, from which he went to Springfield, and from here he was called by the people to the White House, only to be brought back to his long home in Springfield Cemetery.

Definite data give us three log cabins in which Lincoln lived. In one of these he was born. The family moved to another when he was about nine years of age, in the autumn of 1816, of which Noah Brooks writes:

"In 1816 the Lincolns took up their abode in the wilds of Indiana, having lately migrated from Kentucky. They lived in a log cabin built from logs felled by the father, Thomas Lincoln, with the slight assistance of his boy. There was no floor to this abode, but the mother earth, clean and pounded hard. Later on, when by a second marriage the necessity came for putting on a better appearance, a floor was made of slabs of wood split from oak and hickory logs laid on joints of timber and loosely kept in place by wooden pinions."

On March 1, 1830, anxious to advance from Gentryville nearer to the heart of business, the household goods were drawn over muddy roads, by four yoke of oxen, from the old homestead in Indiana to the north side of the Sangamon River, at the junction of the timberland about ten miles westerly from Decatur, Ill. Here he joined his adopted brother in cutting down trees, built a log cabin, plowed fifteen acres of prairie land, fenced and tilled the ground, and raised a crop of sown corn upon it the same year.

It will be wise for the young American, and even for the older lovers of a free country, to pause in life's rush and contemplate the progressive elements in Abraham Lincoln's homes and character. The log cabin is one of the sacred institutions of this nation. It must never be forgotten that some of the country's noblest sons and purest daughters were born in log cabins. We are liable, in the rush and roar of to-day, to forget the voice of yesterday.

The first nine years of Lincoln's life in the Nolin's Creek log cabin were "the simple annals of the poor," but in this humbleness of birth and boyhood the plain virtues of honor, honesty, sobriety and health were taught and fostered. It was here the old, time-worn Bible was daily read, and learned by heart. It was here the mother's family altar was raised and the knee bowed in prayer and praise to Almighty God. It was here that his mother made such an impression upon him that, in after life, he said of her: "All that I am, or hope to be, I owe to my angel mother. Blessings on her memory!"

The log cabin at Gentryville was an improvement on the one they had left at Nolin's Creek. It was here, in the long winter nights, he learned the great selections from the Bible and became much interested in reading the lives of the great men of his own and other lands. Franklin's life and sayings inspired him. The Life of Washington was a pearl in his heart. One night, the pouring rain came in through the logs and almost destroyed this borrowed book, but he went to the owner and worked three days, and afterward owned it. Here Pilgrim's Progress was a power and Æsop's Fables and Robinson Crusoe were gems of the first water.

The Old Schoolhouse Where Lincoln Studied

It was here in this log cabin, after the too severe hardships, that Abraham's mother's health began to give way, and through the long days and weary nights her boy would sit by her bedside and read the precious promises of the Bible to mother. It was here, underneath a tree near the cabin, they buried her, in a rough-hewn coffin, which Abraham had helped to make. It was here, nine months after, on a bright Sabbath morning, at the request of the boy, Parson Elkins preached and prayed over his mother's grave. Here for ten years he was engaged in hard work of various kinds, and went to school in all about a year. He was always fond of books. He would walk miles to borrow a useful book. He wrote on his copybook, on one occasion:

Good boys who to their books apply,
Will all be great men by and by.

When Lincoln was about nineteen, in 1830, on the north side of the Sangamon River, they lived in a log cabin which the boy helped to build. His mind was well stored with knowledge. He had tasted deep enough of the draught of success to be willing to advance to a town, to do and dare in the interest of his own advancement and the good of those at home. His log cabin days were ended, but never to be forgotten. They were the inspirational spots. He read the story writ in every axe dig. It might have often been the rugged way, but it led him to heights heroic.

In 1726, the Rev. William Tennent founded the famous Log College, on the Neshaminy, built of logs, and one story high. From this simple college went out many of the famous ministers of the eighteenth century; and from it grew, in 1746, the great College of New Jersey, now called Princeton University; and, in 1783, Dickinson College, at Carlisle, Pa.

When Abraham Lincoln was of age, and ready to move to larger fields of usefulness for himself and those who remained at home, he went to New Salem. He was successful, and often sent from his scanty earnings money to those who were still struggling with poverty. Judge Douglas describes his life in New Salem thus: "I have known him for nearly twenty-five years. I was a school teacher in the town of Winchester, and he a flourishing grocery-store keeper in the town of New Salem. He was more successful in his occupation than I was in mine, and hence more fortunate in this world's goods. Lincoln is one of those peculiar men who perform with admirable skill everything which they undertake."

In 1832, when the Black Hawk War broke out, Lincoln joined a volunteer company and was chosen as captain. After three months he returned home, a popular man, and ran for the Legislature, but was beaten. At this time he began to consider the best way to earn an honest living. First he thought of being a blacksmith; then he became eager to study law. His store was not very successful, his postmaster business failed, so Major John T. Stuart, then in full practice, encouraged Lincoln to study law and lent him books for that purpose. Lincoln went to work with such earnestness as to master the subject himself and obtained a license in the year 1836, and on April 15, 1837, removed to Springfield and began the practice of law with his friend Stuart, taking him into partnership.

Lincoln's life now began on a bigger scale, for the community soon recognized a prophet in their midst. Here he gave his ringing temperance addresses, and sounded forth his tocsin against injustice; here he set up housekeeping, and saved about three thousand dollars. Here his children were born, all sons, one in 1843, one in 1850, and one in 1853. They lost one who was born in 1846. Here he gained the confidence of the people, and was really a part of their life and thought.

Ida Tarbell, in her little book, He Knew Lincoln, has "Billy Brown" give a description of Lincoln leaving Springfield on his way to the White House: "He knew he was leaving us for good; nuthin' could explain the way he looked, and what he said. He knew he was never comin' back alive. It was rainin' hard; but when we saw him standin' there in barehead, his great big eyes lookin' at us so lovin' and mournful, every man of us took off his hat, just as if he'd been in church. He stood a minute lookin' at us, and then he began to talk. He just talked to us out of his heart. Somehow we felt all of a sudden how much we loved him and he loved us. And when he asked us to pray for him, I don't believe that there was a man in that crowd, whether he ever went to church in his life or not, that didn't want to drop right down on his marrow bones and ask the Lord to take care of Abraham Lincoln and bring him back to us, where he belonged."

This parting of Lincoln with his friends was full of pathos. Listen to his words: "My friends, no one not in my situation can appreciate my feelings of sadness at this parting. To this place, and the kindness of this people, I owe everything. Here I have lived a quarter of a century, and have passed from a young to an old man. Here my children have been born, and one buried. I now leave, not knowing when or whether I may ever return, with a task before me greater than that which rested upon Washington. Without the assistance of the Divine Being, who ever attended him, I cannot succeed. With that assistance I cannot fail. Trusting in Him who can go with me, and remain with you, and be everywhere for good, let us confidently hope that all will be yet well. To His care commending you, as I hope in your prayers you will commend me, I bid you an affectionate farewell." On his way to the White House, he showed how great was his faith in Almighty God, who had never forsaken this favored land.

In 1861, at Washington, he began to direct a nation in its most crucial career. He was the President, and he was also master of the situation. It was here he gave himself for the nation. It was not the White House that honored the man; the man was bigger than the White House; he was the right man in the right place. He was God's man, willing to give himself for others. Here he carried the sorrows of his suffering people. Here he bore the cruel criticism of the unkind, self-seeking souls without a murmur. It was here he placed his pen to one of the world's greatest documents. It was here he went through his Gethsemane. It was here he was sacrificed. It was here the angels placed the crown of crowns upon his brow, and he ascended, honored, crowned, glorified.

O Captain ! my Captain ! our fearful trip is done,
The ship has weathered every rock, the prize we sought is won.
The port is near, the bells I hear, the people all exulting
While follow eyes the steady keel, the vessel grim and daring,
But O Heart ! heart ! heart !
O bleeding drops of red,
Where on the deck my Captain lies,
Fallen, cold and dead.

The Lincoln Relics

In Philadelphia is the most complete collection of Lincoln relics in existence. The exhibition is part of the observance of the Pennsylvania Historical Society of the Lincoln centenary. These relics will be on view from February 8 to 15. Most of the relics are owned by Major William H. Lambert, of Philadelphia.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the collection is the life-mask made of Lincoln, which is now owned by Major Lambert. This is the Mills mask, taken in 1864. The old-fashioned inkstand that stood on Lincoln's desk to the day of his death is also shown, together with a number of volumes from his private library, nearly all with some memento in the actual handwriting of Lincoln. A rare photograph showing the homely, sympathetic features of Lincoln, and signed with his autograph, in the old-fashioned manner, "Your Obt. Servt. A. Lincoln," is an interesting item of the exhibit. Another photograph has preserved a corner of the library, with the favorite "Lincoln chair" in evidence, and the desk with its top shelved for books. Many rare relics in the shape of volumes are included, the most valuable of all being a scrapbook prepared by Lincoln, and bearing on its first page notes in Lincoln's handwriting.

Mrs. Eliza P. Gurney, a member of the Society of Friends, of Philadelphia, wrote several letters to Lincoln and interviewed him on the progress of the war. She was shocked by the slaughter and all the horrors that go with war. But, busy as he was, in September, 1864, the President found time to write a reply, which is shown at the Philadelphia exhibit. Lincoln's letter says:

"I am much indebted to the good Christian people of the country for their constant prayers and consolations, and to no one more than to yourself. The purposes of the Almighty are perfect, and must prevail, though we erring mortals may fail to accurately perceive them in advance. . . . Meanwhile, we must work earnestly in the best light he gives us, trusting that so working conduces to the great ends he ordains. Surely he intends some great good to follow this mighty convulsion, which no mortal could make and no mortal could stay."

PROMINENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

ACCORDING to a report from Paris, one of the most picturesque figures for a generation has passed away in Northern Africa, King Menelik of Abyssinia. If the report proves reliable, it is feared that disturbances may occur and Europeans now in Abyssinia may be in danger. The King, if not dead, is dangerously ill.

Menelik's career reads more like a romance than the story of a present day ruler. He came to the throne as Menelik II., in 1888, his title being in addition, Lion of Judah and Negus Negusti, King of Kings, and Emperor of Ethiopia. He was born in 1842, and was at first King of Shoa, in the south part of the empire. His heir is his grandson, Lig Yasa, a lad of twelve years, the son of one of his daughters. Abyssinia at present is the most important country in Africa under native rulers. Menelik cultivated the friendship of European powers, and did much to develop the resources of the country. He reorganized his army and defeated the Italians, when they tried to extend their authority over his territory. He defeated them in the battle of Adowa, with a force of 80,000. Menelik had a long pedigree, and by Abyssinian historians was said to be a descendant of King Solomon himself.

On Thursday, January 28, General Gomez was formally inaugurated President of Cuba, and for the second time the Cuban ship of state started out to try its fortunes under its own sails. The evening before a reception was given by the city of Havana to the departing provisional government, and the Americans were shown the most cordial attentions. General Gomez took the oath of office at noon at the Palace. The streets were lined with troops as the President-elect and Governor Magoon rode to the great triumphal arch in Albisu Square. Before Governor Magoon left, he received a medal and diploma from the city, the Mayor saying that his fairness during the American occupation had done more than many armies could have accomplished. General Gomez has a big task before him, but he is apparently well fitted to take it up.

Secretary Bacon

Hon. Robert Bacon has recently been confirmed as Secretary of State, by the Senate, in succession to Mr. Root, who has been elected Senator from New York. Mr. Bacon is most admirably fitted for his new position. As Assistant Secretary of State he often had full charge of the department in the absence of Mr. Root, and is thoroughly conversant with its requirements. Mr. Bacon has co-operated most heartily with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in its efforts to relieve the China famine, and in aiding stricken Italy at the present time.

Unprotected Childhood

IT was perhaps merely a coincidence that, right upon the heels of the National Child Labor Conference, which met in Chicago January 21 to 23, a number of the most distinguished American philanthropists and humanitarians should have met in the White House, by the President's special invitation, to discuss the child labor evil. These two notable gatherings, occurring in the same month, show how strong and widespread is the feeling that a great reform is needed, to safeguard the natural rights of a very considerable proportion of the children of the republic.

Several years ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD directed public attention to the criminal manner in which many thousands of children of tender age were practically enslaved in the coal mines, the textile factories, the glass works, the sweat shops and the fruit canneries of various States. It is an evil not confined to any particular section of the Union. In many manufacturing communities child labor is to-day robbing multitudes of little ones of their rightful inheritance. Dwarfed and stunted in growth; underfed and worn out, their little bodies bent and their faces seamed with the lines of age at a time when they should be flushed with health and free to romp and play; deprived of almost all educational opportunities and compelled to go on, year after year, at night work and at day work, in ignorance and helplessness—this is a spectacle which might well awaken the sympathy and excite the indignation of every right-thinking man and woman.

We are gratified to know that our efforts, and those of others, in behalf of the children are now bearing fruit. We shall be more than glad to record the fact should the present agitation result in substantial reform, not in a few States, but in all. With a National Children's Bureau as a branch of the Federal government, and enjoying the fullest State co-operation, much might be accomplished toward checking the heavy toll on health and happiness which is now paid to heartless avarice by unprotected American children.

The Lincoln Centenary

IT is significant of the progress of American thought that, within half a century after the close of Lincoln's life, the man, his work and the great role he played in shaping the destinies of this nation, are at last beginning to be clearly understood. Perhaps no one regretted more deeply than he the bitter strife which wasted so many precious lives. That he was reluctantly swept into the current of tremendous events then passing; that his strange career had developed in him those qualities that especially fitted him for leadership at that juncture; that his rugged mentality gave him firmer grasp and greater breadth in dealing with the hard problems of that period, are facts now recognized by the historians and biographers.

Most of the world's great leaders have been men of humble origin. In our own land, this is almost the invariable rule. No home too humble, no childhood so scant of opportunities, no youth so barren of advantages that it can effectually block the path to ultimate advancement, if only honesty, determination and a single-minded, God-fearing purpose be the basis of the individual character. Lincoln was a peculiar moral and intellectual compound. With rare judgment and native American "horse-sense," he combined an almost woman-like gentleness. His heart was tender and sympathetic; he could be firm as adamant, but was never intolerant. Clear, logical thought and clear, forcible speech seemed to have been his natural endowment, and it was marvelous how one who had so few early opportunities could rise to heights that are ordinarily accessible only to highly cultivated minds. He was a great student, and Lincoln reading law by the log fire is a classic in American art. His public life is etched in deep, Rembrandtesque high-lights and shadows, the latter prevailing. But while the whole was cast in tragic form, befitting the time in which he lived, it was a life sustained throughout by unshaken reliance upon God.

One of our latest American poets, Lyman Whitney Allen, who has framed a national epic on this theme, has this fine passage on Nature's dealings with Lincoln:

She bound him, that he might feel
The weight of oppression's heel;
She starved him, that he might learn
The hunger of souls that yearn;
She bruised him, that he might know
Somewhat of the world's great woe.

She helmed him with faith; she placed
The girdle of strength at his waist;
And over his breast she laid
The buckler of right; the blade
Of truth she set in his hand,
And bade him unwavering stand,
As Moses stood with his rod,
For freedom—and for God.

"Living Like Jesus"

IN some parts of the West, what is now known as "the Jesus movement" is proving fruitful in spiritual experiences. At recent meetings in Cleveland a large number of very interesting testimonies were given by those who, a month before, had pledged themselves to "live as Jesus would do" for a specified period.

Looking over the testimonies, one notes with sympathetic interest, the troubles that beset the novice in this daily Christian life. Sensitiveness to ridicule as "cranks" and "fanatics"; the daily flood of petty lies, exaggeration and misrepresentation in business; the temptation to unfair dealing in weights and measures; the fixed habit of profanity; the tendency to slander and detraction in daily familiar conversation; gross desires, selfishness, vanity, covetousness and many similar obstacles are admitted in these confessions as having proved serious stumbling-blocks to the earnest seekers after the Christ-life. But much has been accomplished, and there were many who declared that their two weeks' attempt had made them resolve to continue it all their lives. Even those who confessed failure rejoiced that they had made the trial, though they were mocked, sneered at and reviled, and some even had to suffer loss for His name's sake.

Our Saviour himself warned his followers how the world would oppose and oppress them, and how all the forces of sin would rise up against them. The Christian's life is a battle throughout; but he has the assurance of victory, and having this, he can still press onward from height to height, his soul overflowing with a love and peace which the world cannot give nor take away.

Italy's Widows and Babes

THE praise universally accorded to Italy's beautiful Queen, who has done such Christlike service among the earthquake sufferers at Messina and Reggio, is surely merited. Few women of any station would have cared or dared to visit the ruined cities of her land in their first awful throes. There was imminent danger of further destruction. Scenes of horror were to be anticipated, such as the eyes of tenderly reared women can seldom bear. Even food and sleep might be denied her.

From her previous experience in smaller seismic disturbances in Italy, Queen Helena was able to count well the cost of a personal visit to stricken Calabria; but that "genius for sympathy," which is attributed to her, was deeply aroused. No expostulations availed. Scarcely had the news of the calamity reached her before, in company with her husband, this remarkable woman was on her way to the scene of the disaster, armed with as many supplies as could be hurriedly gathered. Few spectacles in history have surpassed this one for thrilling human interest.

Hatless and clad most simply, this royal Florence Nightingale hurried from village to village, binding up wounds with the skill of a trained nurse; sharing her lunch with starving women by the roadside; soothing crying children; often sleepless; once fasting for two continuous days; such was the life she led during the two weeks following the frightful earthquake, which had killed at a blow over 100,000 of her subjects.

It is not strange that the design of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to raise a special fund for the widows and the fatherless little children, bereaved by the earthquake, should appeal with peculiar force to the heart of this wonderful woman, and that she should promise to personally superintend its distribution.

A cable dispatch from Ambassador Griscom warmly endorses the plan of this fund and commends it as worthy in every way of the patronage and co-operation of all Americans. He adds that "the real period of difficulty and distress is but just beginning." Our special correspondent in Messina, in his graphic letter which appears in this issue, fully confirms this conclusion.

It can readily be seen that as the first enthusiasm of sympathy passes, and new causes begin to press for recognition, the suffering in Italy is likely to grow dim in the public mind, unless we remind ourselves of it afresh. The Queen has personally signified her satisfaction in this fund and her intention to see personally that it is wisely applied.

Barcelona, in Spain, is now reported to have met the fate of Messina, being overwhelmed by a tidal wave and earthquake on January 29.

A Beautiful Missionary Work

SOME time ago a communication appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from the pen of Bishop J. B. Scott, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, appealing for aid in raising a "redemption fund" for saving from heathenism the seven children of Jasper Grant, a native convert and preacher in Monrovia, Liberia, West Africa. According to ancient tribal custom, these children, on the death of their parent, would be claimed by heathen relatives and taken back to pagan surroundings. All these seven children are girls, and the immediate fate in store for them was that the whole family would be swallowed up in heathenism and the children sold to heathen men as wives, as the ancient native usage permitted.

Bishop Scott pleaded for their redemption at $30 each—the price fixed by their heathen relatives. It was an urgent case. Our readers responded with hearts full of sympathy for those children, and with such amazing liberality that the redemption fund was over-subscribed 400 per cent.—five times the amount required being quickly raised. Bishop Scott asked for $240, but when, just before leaving for Africa, he called at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, he received $300, the extra $60 being an allowance to provide immediate necessities for the girls, who lacked clothing, etc. Thus the redemption was accomplished and the seven children are now in good Christian keeping, duly and legally transferred by their relatives, and are being properly trained and cared for, with a view to probable future missionary usefulness.

Meanwhile, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is returning to the donors the over-subscribed surplus of the redemption fund, and has already sent back the greater part of it, $500 having been returned in a single day. All who contributed after the $300 had been raised will thus receive their gift back again, with thanks for their liberality and with a full appreciation of the Christlike spirit which led them to help the enterprise.

The "Baltic" Coming Into New York Harbor with the Rescued Passengers . . . . A Glimpse of Her 'tween Decks, Showing the Crowd of the Saved

Wireless Prevents Horrible Disaster

WHEN the White Star liner Baltic came to the dock in New York, January 25, she had on board more than a thousand men and women who had looked death in the face at sea for many hours. The Baltic rescued the passengers of the White Star pleasure liner Republic and the Italian Lloyd immigrant steamship Florida, which came together in collision off Nantucket the Saturday morning before. The compartments kept the Republic afloat for a good many hours, and two cutters undertook to save her; but only a few miles out from the shore she went down. Just before she disappeared, a blue light flared and Second Officer Williams went overboard with the British Naval Reserve flag. A boat was dropped from the Gresham and rode to his rescue, under the searchlight of three vessels. The second blue light was to be fired by Captain John Inman Sealby, when he was ready to leave the vessel. He went into the steamer's rigging, and climbed nimbly like a monkey to the topmost rig; and, as the Republic, with a shudder, gave up her last air compartment, he set off the second blue light. That both of these brave men came up from the whirlpool of the sea, made by the sinking vessel, and were rescued, is one of the marvels of the story.

Jack Binns, Hero
Whose wireless messages brought help

As it was, six persons were killed; but that there were not twice six hundred lost was owing to the fact that the Marconi wireless system had been installed upon the Republic, and because one of the most competent and courageous operators the world ever knew had charge of the apparatus. The name of this man is John R. Binns. The moment the shock came he flashed wireless calls for help, the code letters of which are "C. Q. D," and out through the fog and darkness this call of distress went over a radius of about seven hundred miles, and in answer to it ships came from every direction to the rescue. While the ship was sinking, this brave man stayed at his post, and, when he was faint with hunger, he found it necessary to swim across the cabin, which was flooded, to a place where he found two biscuits and some salted almonds; and he never left his post, which promised to be the gateway of death, until the ship was settling for good. From another vessel he sent by wireless this word: "With the crash the whole ship was in darkness, as the engine room had been flooded. I tried the power, and found it was cut off. But I was able to switch to my accumulator storage batteries and thus call for assistance. I was not in the wireless room when the collision occurred. The tiny apartment had been badly wrecked. My first concern was for the apparatus. The drawing of the furnaces and the shutting off of the boilers had stopped the dynamos. I found the apparatus intact, and immediately commenced sending messages." He was so loyal to his duty, so insensible to danger, so successful in bringing relief, that his name will be immortalized among American heroes. The Congress at Washington paused in its proceedings, and spent ten minutes in making mention and rejoicing over the brave deeds of this superb man. Mr. Boutelle, a member from Illinois, said, among other things, "Binns has given to the world a splendid illustration of the heroism that dwells in many who are doing the quiet, unnoticed tasks of life. Is it not an inspiration for all of us to feel that there are heroes for every emergency, and that in human life no danger is so great that some Jack Binns is not ready to face it?"

Only eleven years have elapsed since the time of Marconi's wireless signaling at Flatholm and only six years since the exchange of wireless messages between Cape Breton and Cornwall. Now the earth is girdled with wireless stations. It is likely that the success of the system on the Republic will make the installation of the wireless obligatory on all ships sailing the sea. If the Florida had had such an apparatus, there would have been no collision.

After the marvels of the Marconi wireless telegraphy, the coldest student of science should not doubt the reality and the efficacy of the communication between the human and the divine heart in prayer. Out into the fog and darkness, and through the wireless air and across the wide sea, there go the cries of God's children to their Father, calling for help and salvation.

He also will hear their cry, and will save them. (Ps. 145 : 19.)

Human Sacrifice in the Philippines

Little children are sometimes sacrificed to heathen gods in lands under the jurisdiction of the American government. Rumor came to the Governor of the district that the people of the tribe of Bagobos, in the Philippine Islands, living in a settlement called Talon, near Digos, had been guilty of offering a human sacrifice. Allan Walker, the District Governor of Devao, went himself on an errand of investigation and found the report too true. Datu Ansig, the chief, told the Governor that they had offered the sacrifice according to their custom, as a religious duty, and would tell him all about it—that they offered sacrifices to the god of evil to avert drought, and to allow widows to marry again. Addy and Obby, two widows, went to their chief and asked him to have a sacrifice offered that they might marry again, and the ceremony was arranged for them. A little slave boy, eight years of age, deaf and cross-eyed, was tied, naked, to a tree, and, amidst the greatest formalities, these two widows stuck a spear through the child. His body was cut up into little pieces, and distributed as a souvenir and as a protection against the evil spirit. The American government summoned these people to trial and convicted them, but suspended the sentence, feeling that mercy and the missionary treatment of the heathen, under the circumstances, would be more efficacious than justice; but the Governor told them plainly that, if anything of the kind should occur again, the members of the tribe would be convicted of murder and sentence would not be suspended. The chief promised the government should have no more trouble with them.

In human government there is a place for mercy which is exceedingly efficacious, and the American government has done wisely with her savage and heathen wards by this exhibition of leniency. It is a blessed thing for men and women that mercy has such a wide place in God's economy. If our heavenly Father were unmindful of our ignorance, our weakness and temptations, and if he had not arranged, by the sacrifice of his Son, for abundant mercy to the penitent, all hope would fade from mortals.

But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ. (Eph. 2 : 4, 5.)

In Imitation of Christ

A movement in imitation of Christ has been started in Cleveland, O. A number of young people of that city, variously estimated from two to ten thousand, have undertaken to live for two weeks as Jesus would were he on the earth. The Cleveland Leader has this editorial comment on the movement:

When thousands of young men and women, and boys and girls, old enough to understand fully their responsibilities and the nature of their pledge, undertake to live for two weeks, at least, as Jesus would live, under like circumstances, with their environment and their human limitations of body and mind and powers, an effort is made for righteousness which ought to command the approval and admiration of the most skeptical and the least religious. The fortnight of high aiming and striving upon which the members of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, the Epworth League and the Baptist Young People's Union have entered ought to call forth, by reason of its lofty aspirations and its efforts to realize the most ideal uprightness and purity, the commendation and sympathy of all classes and denominations.

Kipling has said that New York City is a long hog trough, where they have spasms of reform. Spasms of reform are better than nothing, but the steady habit of service and duty is better. The spectacular movement to live two weeks in imitation of Christ is praiseworthy and will lead to good results, but being and living like Christ not only for two weeks, but for fifty-two weeks, and for all the years, is the duty of every Christian, young and old. There are human limitations, there are powerful temptations, but Christ should always be the ideal, and every energy of body, mind and soul should be employed in imitation of him. Christ's footsteps are red with sacrifice, and his disciples can find them and follow him if they will try.

But Jesus said unto him, Follow me. (Matt. 8:22.)

A Dog as a Hero

Four men were killed, and more than a score had narrow escapes from death, as an avalanche of snow swept over the Camp Bird Mine, at Ouray, recently. The four men, who were in a shanty directly in the path of the avalanche, were buried under thousands of tons of snow, rocks and dirt, and hurled into the canyon and destroyed. It will be midsummer before their bodies can be recovered. A teamster saw the slide coming, and made a desperate effort to drive out of the way. He was caught and buried. His faithful dog rushed at the snow and began to dig furiously. He kept at it until he had reached the buried man, who crawled out unharmed. The dog's loyalty and diligence in rescuing his master ought to put to shame many selfish, cold-hearted people who do not care much how many people are buried with the avalanche and who will not put forth any energy of body or soul to rescue them. All of the expressions of human benevolence are but the illustrations of that infinite love that fills the Father's heart and inspired the Saviour's life.

For the Son of man is come to save that which was lost. (Matt. 18 : 11.)

Amid Italy's Scenes of Suffering

From REV. WM. CARTER, D. D.
OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT IN MESSINA

Photograph by our Special Correspondent

The Ruins of the Municipal Palace, Messina

MESSINA, SICILY, January 15, 1909.

WHEN Mr. Griscom, American Ambassador at Rome, found I had been asked by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to write a description of the catastrophe, and the relief work that is being done, he said to me:

"There is nothing too much to do for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, after its splendid contribution toward the relief fund, and I will gladly do all in my power to facilitate your investigations."

He immediately gave me all the privileges of the relief steamship Bayern and procured a permit for me from the Minister of the Interior at Rome giving me free access within the military and relief lines throughout all the stricken territory. I found little need of this, however, for as soon as I mentioned that I was representing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of New York, every barrier was broken down, especially at hospitals, relief stations and Red Cross camps, and I had abundant means of studying the subject at first hand.

Never in the world's history has there been a greater calamity than this, never indeed one so great. Pompeii, Herculaneum, Lisbon, Martinique, and San Francisco, with all their horrors seem puny beside this tremendous devastation and its awful slaughter. Lisbon, the largest of earth's catastrophes until now, with its 50,000 victims, is just about one-fourth as appalling as this cataclysm, with over 200,000 victims, in more than a hundred cities, towns and villages. From Palmi, on the north, to Melito, on the south of the Calabrian coast, and from Messina, on the north, to Nizza, on the south of the Sicilian border, the earth was shaken to its very centre and the work of centuries overthrown in a moment of time.

At times such as these rumor is apt to exaggerate, and first news to prove hysterical and unreliable, but in the present instance the first dispatches proved to minimize rather than exaggerate the facts. At first it was said it was only Messina and Reggio that were affected; then Scylla and Palmi were mentioned; then a score of other towns sent in their heart-breaking news, until at last a list of over a hundred towns, villages and hamlets were reported as overwhelmed. Of course, all the detailed accounts, and lists of the dead, cannot yet be given, but in a tabulated list of fifty-seven places I have before me there are definite statistics given of 165,053 casualties from the earthquake, this list not taking into account the large number of injured now in the hospitals, who are already past recovery, nor fifty other mountain villages not yet sending in their fatalities.

Notwithstanding all these facts, however, I still felt it could not be as bad as it seemed from the accounts. That a city of 150,000 people, like Messina, could be wiped out in a single quake of the earth's crust seemed impossible, unless the earth should open its gigantic maw and swallow it completely. I therefore came to Messina with the feeling that I should not find things as bad as chronicled and that my work in writing about it would be rather corrective than otherwise.

My first view of the city, however, dispelled all such thoughts. From the deck of the steamer in which I entered the harbor I found pile after pile of awful ruins, and as far as I could see there appeared no end. My investigations on shore only served to confirm this first view. Nowhere, and I say it carefully, nowhere in Messina did I see a habitable dwelling. Every house, every store, every building of every kind was either lying in a heap of dust and debris or, if the outer walls were still standing, the roof and inner walls had fallen in upon their helpless inmates. This, let me say, will account for the apparently intact condition of some of the buildings in some of the pictures I am sending.

We only get at an appreciation of facts by some unit of measure, some standard or gauge well known to all. To hear that a coast town in Sicily has been overwhelmed only gives to the average man in America the idea that an insignificant town of mean huts and dwellings has been destroyed. Here, however, remember, was a city larger than Denver, Columbus or Toledo, with municipal buildings, palaces, mansions and public improvements as great, if not greater, than any of these mentioned. It was a city twice as large as Hartford, Conn., or Reading, Pa.; three times as large as Salt Lake City and San Antonio, and was, with Palermo, the chief commercial centre of Sicily. In 1904, the last exact statistics available, 7,703 vessels, carrying 486,000 tons of merchandise, cleared from her harbor, and with her famous oranges, named after her, Messina supplied the world.

It is no mean city, therefore, on which this scourge has fallen; but one of such pretensions as rightly ranked her among the world's commercial centres.

Alas, what a change is there now! In a moment of time 108,000 of her citizens were carried down to death, all of her commercial houses were overthrown, her magnificent docks destroyed, and the homes of her people made into dust heaps and charnel houses.

The Via Roma, Messina, After the Earthquake

Just as I write this, a man well known in the commercial world, supplying many American firms and speaking perfect English, says to me:

"I have lost over a million dollars in the earthquake; but, worse than that, I have lost a wife and eight children, two sisters and a brother. What is there left for me?"

Another man, with whom I talked to-night, said: "I worked for twenty-three years in America, and saved enough to start in business over here. I came back just nine months ago; and now, in two seconds, the work of twenty-three years has been destroyed!" And so the awful story goes.

"How did it seem to you?" I asked of one of the survivors in the hospital, a woman who had lost a husband and two children.

"Ah," she said, through an interpreter, "it seemed like the end of the world. I don't want to think of it again. It took all I had in life. I want no more of this world."

In the worst calamities, however, there are always bright sides; and the bright side of this horror is the way the heart of the world has been shown. Everywhere there is gratitude expressed toward all the nations for their sympathy and substantial help, but especially toward America and her munificence in this hour of need.

I had the melancholy privilege of assisting this afternoon at the finding of the bodies of our American Consul Cheney and his wife by the crew from the American battleship Illinois, and of other bodies that have been discovered to-day. Living beings are still rescued from the ruins, even though this is the nineteenth day since the disaster.

WILLIAM CARTER.

[Rev. William Carter, D.D., the writer of the above graphic account, is pastor of the Madison Avenue Reformed Church, New York City. He went to Sicily from Switzerland, immediately upon news of the earthquake, to act as correspondent in the field for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.]

Good Queen Helena of Italy Caring for the Wounded in Messina

Telegraphic dispatches give further accounts, in addition to Dr. Carter's vivid description, of conditions in the stricken city.

Amid Italy's Scenes of Suffering

The Bodies of Consul Cheney and His Wife Being Carried Through the Streets of New York

Italian torpedo boats, which are able to touch at towns along the coast inaccessible to larger craft, are busily distributing the supplies brought over on the American steamship Celtic. The people have all been informed whence the supplies came, and there are great outbursts of enthusiasm for Americans and America when the relief boats appear. No other land, besides their own beloved Italy, is so much in their minds as that of the Stars and Stripes, which has sent not only sympathy, but also the food to supply the famishing sufferers.

The supplies, so far, have only met the immediate demand; there were many tens of thousands to be fed, and even when what appeared to be a good supply was left in a town, it was soon exhausted and demands made for more. It takes a great many tons of food to keep alive a vast population, which at present is absolutely without any means of gaining a livelihood. Even those who received the first aid in Messina and vicinity have passed many a hungry hour since the first few days when the food supplies were first landed from the relief ships.

The military authorities have been so intent on clearing the city of its inhabitants that, for a time, no food was given out by the Italians themselves; this, however, caused serious disturbances, and a great deal of uneasiness was manifested by the rank and file of the troops. After some days, food distribution, in small quantities, was resumed.

The people who have lost relatives and friends in the ruins of Messina still linger about the place, in the hope that the bodies may be found. Again and again they seek the ruins of their homes, and watch the soldiers removing stones and timbers; some, even at this late day, hope against hope that by some miracle some relative may have been able to survive, if buried in the ruins of the kitchen, and in many cases this has proved true. One man, eighty years old, was recovered, who had been buried for twenty-nine days.

The smallest estimate yet given is that there are at least 60,000 undiscovered bodies beneath the ruins of Messina. Hundreds have already been buried in long trenches, in the suburbs of the city, and the long procession of biers carried by soldiers, with soldiers marching beside with spade and shovel over their shoulders, has become a familiar sight on both the Sicilian and Calabrian sides of the Straits of Messina. As the long lines pass the people drop upon their knees and pray, for they know not but that among the shrouded forms, crushed beyond all hope of recognition, there may be the body of brother or sister, mother or father, or their own child, for it is impossible to find a refugee who has not lost some one near and dear to him. After the cortege passes, some are almost too weak to struggle to their knees, for hunger, lack of proper clothing, inadequate shelter, and, above all else, the constant sense of fear lest the earth again match its power against their feeble strength, is doing its work.

The arrival of the bodies of Consul Cheney and his wife in New York brought home to the American people the thought that Italy alone did not have her dead to mourn. Four thousand Italians, representing twenty-two Italian societies, met at the pier the bodies of the brave American who perished at Messina, and his wife, and formed an escort of honor. The long procession marched slowly up New York to the Grand Central Station, where the bodies were to be placed on board a train for New Haven. The two hearses were followed by a large number of carriages filled high with flowers, and the Italian marchers carried the flags of Italy and America, wreathed with mourning bands. The crowds along the sidewalk were visibly affected by the solemnity of the occasion, and the men bared their heads as the cortege passed.

The real interest and sympathy for the cause of the earthquake sufferers is shown in the brief notes which accompany donations, great and small, from all parts of the United States and Canada. Many express the wish that they could give more, and pray that others may be moved to give something from that with which God has blessed them to aid the suffering Italians in their hour of dire need. The fund, under the personal patronage of Queen Helena, for the widows and babies has appealed especially to the generous hearts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family.

Mrs. M. M. T., of Ontario, Canada, writes: "Enclosed please find $1 for the Italian Earthquake Fund. It seems so pitifully small, in view of the great need, but it is the widow's mite. It will help a little." One dollar can do much good. It will keep a number of persons for twenty-four hours. No one should hesitate to send an offering because it is small. Small contributions are gladly accepted, as many of them together will do much toward helping the stricken people.

We would remind all those who intend to contribute that the earlier their money is sent in the more good it will do. Every contribution will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Contributions to Queen Helena's Widows and Babies Fund should be so designated. All contributions should be addressed: Italian Earthquake Fund, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

Pleading for the Children

"PRESERVE the American Home" was the opening theme of the National Conference on the Care of Dependent Children, which held its first session in the East Room of the White House January 25. The programme was announced in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD.

President Roosevelt called the delegates to order, and, after outlining the general scope of the Conference, he called Mr. Homer Folks, president of the New York Probation Commission, to the chair.

The principal speakers, after the President, were Amos W. Butler, secretary State Board of Charities, of Indiana, and Hugh F. Fox, president State Board of Children's Guardians, New Jersey. It was the unanimous opinion of the leading charity workers and others who took part in the discussion that the child can best be reared under the influence of the home, and should be removed from the family circle only when proper supervision at home is impossible. It also was the consensus of opinion that where poverty exists in the home State aid should be extended.

Don't Pay $3.00

For What We Give You Free

The fad today is Silver Butter-Spreaders.

Every housewife wants a set. Sooner or later she'll have one.

But she doesn't need to buy them if she'll act at once.

For we are giving for a little time an elegant set of these Spreaders—free.

These beautiful Butter-Spreaders are of the stylish Lily pattern in Wm. Rogers & Son AA triple plate.

The price, if you could buy them, would be $3 or more for the six.

We are going to supply to our customers, for a little time, six of these Spreaders free.

Simply Do This:

Send either the metal cap from a jar of Armour's Extract of Beef or the paper certificate under the top, with 10c to cover cost of packing and mailing, and we'll send you one of these Spreaders.

For six tops or certificates from six jars, we'll give you six of these Spreaders, making a beautiful silver set—fit to grace any table. The Lily pattern is one of the daintiest designs in silver today. But as glad as you'll be to get these Spreaders, you'll be more pleased to know of the "Extract."

For you'll find it will make all of your meats and soups and gravies even more savory than ever. You'll never know till you try it just what it adds and saves.

The saving is in adding new flavor to left-overs and cold meats.

It imparts a deliciousness to fresh meats and soups that tempts the most jaded of palates.

Armour's EXTRACT of BEEF

As an instance:—

Try making a rich, brown gravy with Armour's Extract of Beef.

See if it doesn't improve it greatly—doesn't add a superlative zest.

The Germans and French, who are famous as cooks, make all their gravies this way.

Judge if you ever tasted a gravy even one-half so delicious.

Serve a gravy made this way tomorrow night. See what your husband says. Give the "little ones" such "bread and gravy" as they never knew could exist.

Don't Be Mistaken

Don't think of Armour's Extract of Beef as only for use in the sick room.

Those who think that don't know what they miss. That is the least of its uses.

Its real value is for use in the kitchen. And it should be used every day. There are a hundred ways to use it.

After six jars you will use hundreds and better every dish. You'll never again be without a jar ready in the kitchen.

Four Times the Best

But please don't forget to get "Armour's," for Armour's goes four times as far. The directions read, "Use one-fourth as much," for our extract is concentrated.

We would like to give you a jar—free—to prove its advantages. We don't, because that would cheapen it. But we want you to have it.

That is why we return, for a little time, more than you pay for the extract, by giving you one of these Butter-Spreaders for the metal top or certificate—or as many as you need to make up a beautiful set.

So order the first jar of your grocer or druggist today, and begin to receive the Spreaders, at the same time begin the use of the extract and learn what that use means.

Judge by the first jar of the extract if you'll ever again go without it. Simply hear what your people say when they taste that dainty new flavor.

When sending the tops or certificates for the Butter-Spreaders, address Armour & Company, Chicago, Dept. AB.

SOME VICTORIOUS DEFEATS*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THIS story of Stephen, the first New Testament martyr, flashes out as many lights as a diamond; light for both worlds, on how to live nobly and die bravely; lessons on personal beauty, on laymen's opportunities, on missions, martyrdom, heaven. The whole story of Stephen must be recalled, as thrilling a "short story" as ever was written, if only the reader is great hearted and is hearing it for the first time.

The place is the old Jerusalem, the *un*holy city, where many faithful messengers of God had been persecuted for speaking unwelcome truths — among others, Jeremiah, Jesus, John and Peter. The children of ancient persecutors had been boasting: "If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers in the blood of the prophets." It is a true picture of human nature. Each generation thinks itself incapable of the meanness and cruelty of its predecessors, and presently indulges in similar or greater outbursts of selfishness or passion. Those who uttered the above words outdid all their ancestors when they not only imprisoned John and stoned Stephen, but even crucified Christ. We do well to humbly say, as we hear of human wrongdoing, "Lord, is it I?" Is there latent in me the tendencies that may grow into such wrongs? "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and save me from hidden faults."

The time is during the first decade of the Christian Church. In an outburst of God-given altruism all who had more than enough property have devoted it to the support of those who had too little. But when such a spirit might have been expected to submerge the unlovely human qualities of envy and jealousy, the Grecian Jews had been complaining that their widows were not getting their share as compared with the widows of the Jews of Palestine. This complaint led the apostles, who had hitherto tried to manage church finances as well as preaching, to inaugurate the first order of lay officers in the church, the deacons, whose official duties required only the handling of church benevolences; but of the seven deacons two at least were flaming lay evangelists, effective pleaders for home missions and foreign missions: Philip and Stephen, who might well be considered the patron saints of the multiplying laymen's brotherhoods and men's leagues in the churches. The reason why the first Christian Church elected Stephen, because he was "full of faith and of the Holy Spirit," might well be kept in mind in electing not only deacons, but trustees also, and all other lay officers, some of whom, for lack of spiritual sympathy, only hinder when they should help. It would be a pertinent subject for brief discussion in this lesson whether, for example, unspiritual men, church supporters but Christ rejectors, should ever be elected to the office of church trustees.

Stephen, "full of grace and power, wrought great wonders and signs among the people" (6:8), persuading so many Jews that Jesus is the Messiah that the unbelieving Jews set their ablest debaters to controvert his words—all in vain. "They were not able to withstand the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spake" (6:10). Beaten in the field of fair argument, they sought to defeat him by tricks. They hired false witnesses to accuse him before the Sanhedrin, and then seized him and dragged him before that court, which had no legal right to inflict the death penalty, for Judea was a Roman province. But this event probably occurred when Pilate had been deposed and his successor had not yet gotten the reins of government in hand.

A Wonderful Face

Stephen's first answer to the charges against him, as he stood facing the seventy-two judges in the half circle of the Sanhedrin, was a face that proclaimed not only innocence and peace, but a Spirit-filled life. "All that were in the council, fastening their eyes on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel" (6:15). This is the third transfiguration recorded in the Bible. Moses, returning from the vision of God, "wist not that his face shone," but its reflection of the God of glory he had seen was so dazzling that it was necessary to veil his face lest the people should be blinded by its sunlit rays. In the case of Christ, and no doubt the case of Stephen also, it was a transfiguration wrought by prayer from within. "As he prayed the fashion of his countenance was changed." Many who are seeking to make themselves beautiful by cosmetics and face gymnastics of "beauty doctors" need to be reminded that "of the mind the body form doth take."

It was said of one, "He was uglier than he had any business to be." Hiram Munger was giving an unfaithful Christian a thorough scoring. Among other things, he said, "You are ugly and cross and homely." The reply was, "I am not to blame for being homely." "Yes, you are; you look well enough when you've got the grace of God in your heart." A woman was convicted of sin by noting, one day in the mirror, how her habit of fretfulness was cutting its unlovely marks in her face. The result was repentance and regeneration of heart and face alike. The story is well known of a burglar, converted in Mr. Moody's meetings at St. Louis, who wanted to work for others, but felt his sin-blurred face was against him. He prayed that not only his heart, but his face also, might be changed, and it was, as is proved by photographs "before and after." The writer knew of a like case of a man opposed to Christianity, at Scranton, who by the efforts of his Christian wife and his pastor, and a passing reform lecturer, was led to become one of the most active Christian workers. In a year his face had the "solar light" of unselfish devotion. Hudson Taylor tells of a missionary to China whose heart was so glowing with love to God and man that it transfigured his face, and before he had been twelve months in China he was called by the natives "Mr. Gloryman." It was said of a former Endeavor leader, by a commercial traveler who sat at table with him, "If I ever become a Christian it will be because of the face of that man." "The beauty of the Lord our God be upon us," the only beauty that is a "joy forever," and not only a joy but a power for good, a voice for God. The speech of Stephen was cut off by gnashing teeth, but when he spoke silently in his transfigured face he spoke to spellbound hearers. Let us consecrate our faces to God's service.

A Layman's Wonderful Missionary Speech

The first real argument for foreign missions in the new Christian Church was this extemporaneous address of a lone Christian before an unfriendly court, which was given under his right to make his own defense. He began, with skill and tact, with Abraham, a heathen, dwelling among idol worshipers, who was the first great "pilgrim father" to "go West," seeking "freedom to worship God." How utterly illogical it was for these children of a convert from idol worship to be opposing the extension of the blessings of the true religion to the Gentiles of their own time, as if it had always been a God-given monopoly of the Jews! Then he passes along the zigzag course of Hebrew history, to show how the Jews themselves, from the times of the exodus, had ever and anon relapsed into idolatry—had become, indeed, "heathen at home," as do many to-day who are most opposed to foreign missions. A third point in Stephen's discourse was brought out, as in chronological review he reached the days of David—giving him a chance to reply to the charge that he had spoken against the temple because he had taught it was not so much the place of worship as the spirit of it that availed. "Howbeit the Most High dwelleth not in houses made with hands." He had begun to quote their own prophets in support of his teaching that God must be worshiped in spirit, when he saw the angry crowd, and even the judges, would allow him but a few words more, and so he sprang to his conclusion of righteous indignation: "Ye stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Spirit; as your fathers did, so do ye" (7:51). It is appropriate to recall here that one side of holiness is hot hatred of evil things. The Bible teaches us to "hate evil" in many passages, no less than to love goodness. This righteous indignation is one of the neglected graces, due perhaps to the excessive femininity of the churches hitherto. This manly quality ought to come to its own now that laymen are becoming a more active factor in church life. And it is cheering that a large element of the laymen's movement is directed to increased study and support of foreign missions. If it was illogical for children of Abraham, the child of idol-worshiping ancestry, to oppose foreign missions, much more is it illogical for us, whose very calendar should remind us daily that our fathers, not so long ago but that we must still fight in ourselves the remnants of savagery, worshiped the sun on Sunday and the moon on Moonday (Monday) and Tuiske on Tuesday, Woden on Wednesday, and Thor on Thursday, and Freya on Friday, and Saturn on Saturday. We should still be white savages, but for the coming to our pagan ancestors of that first missionary to Europe, Paul, whose first missionary lesson was Stephen's speech, which he heard with unfriendly ears before he voted for Stephen's execution and guarded the clothes of those who stoned him. (Let it not be forgotten that this speech of Stephen comes to us from the memory of Paul, who must have given it to Luke.)

Europe is far from what it ought to be, but the social regeneration of Europe has made great progress since Paul heard the cry of heathen Europe, "Come over and help us!" and "noblesse oblige" makes us "debtors" to the idol worshipers of to-day who live in "a world without love," a present hell of superstitious fears, to pass on to them the blessings of Christianity that we have received.

The Little Doctor

A New Serial Story Written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

George Hunter and Dudley Verner were college chums and are stopping at the country home of the former. George is introdueed to Miss Danforth, daughter of Squire Danforth, who lives on the fine estate called "Paradise." A village character, Jack Green, takes them to see "Paradise." They there meet Miss Danforth, and Dudley is introduced. As they leave, the Squire drives by on the way home. His daughter is surprised at his sudden return. He says he is going abroad, and will take her and her aunt. They go to call on Mrs. Hunter and her niece, Miss Sanborn. The Squire discovers that Mrs. Hunter is an old friend. On his return he tells Aunt Phœbe a family secret, which greatly agitates her. Dudley Verner starts life as a doctor in a quiet neighborhood. The two friends save a little boy named Donald Fraser from being run over. Mrs. Fraser was George's aunt, who had run away to marry Captain Fraser. They lost track of her. George finds she has been badly treated and deserted." Mrs. Fraser discovers that her husband still lives and again disappears. Squire Danforth finds a friend in an insane asylum who has information which may lift his daughter writes, a cloud from his life. George's mother proposes to go to Long Branch. Jack Green comes to George and informs him that Captain Fraser was looking for the Hunter family to find his wife. George has his mother and cousin prepare for an early start. Green drives Fraser to the Hunter home so slowly that he arrives too late. The Hunter party stops in New York. Captain Fraser finds them and demands to see Mrs. Hunter and his wife. He will not believe that the latter is not with them. George comes in and informs him he knows something about him which will put him in safe keeping for some time. The captain leaves. Mrs. Hunter is hurried to Long Branch. The young men out walking think they see Donald Fraser, but he disappears in the crowd. Verner tells George the story of his life; that he was adopted while Mr. Verner was traveling in Spain.

AS George and Dr. Verner talked of what was filling their minds almost constantly night and day, a loud cry arose, which was followed presently by scream after scream somewhere in the distance.

Both sprang to their feet, and, looking in the direction from which the sounds proceeded, they saw a man running toward them with a child in his arms; and George and Dudley both felt intuitively that the child was Donald Fraser.

They sprang upon the man just as a crowd came rushing up to learn the cause of the outcry; and while George held the ruffian, Dudley tore the child from his arms.

As Donald (for he it really was) sobbed out, "Oh, doctor, is it you? Save me!" an exclamation of horror caused Dudley to look back, and he saw George lying on the beach, evidently felled by a blow from the scoundrel's hand. A moment later, having placed the child in Elsie's care, Dudley hurried back to the scene of the encounter.

The dastardly wretch had fled, and the stunned man, unconscious and bleeding from a wound on the head, was being tenderly cared for by the inmates of the nearest cottage, who had carried him to their home. Kneeling by his side was a woman, sobbing out, "Oh, George, my darling, has he killed you?"

Dudley saw at a glance that it was Ellen, and stooping down he whispered, "Mrs. Fraser, your child is safe with Elsie, and now you must come away and not agitate our brave friend here, who will soon be all right again."

Wringing his hand, she looked at him gratefully as he helped her to a seat in a sheltered corner of the piazza, where she could be near George and yet not in sight when he should come to himself.

It was so long ere he opened his eyes that Dudley became alarmed, but at last he looked up with a smile of recognition, which Dudley marked with a fervent "Thank God!" adding gently, "Take this medicine, George, which I have prepared for you. You have had a fall, but are better now. Do not try to think about it."

Then walking out to Mrs. Fraser and grasping her hand, he said, "Let us be thankful that things are no worse. George has become conscious, and after arranging with the owners of the house to have him remain here for a time I will send a message to relieve Mrs. Hunter's mind and will see Elsie and give her directions as to the care of Donald.

"Rest assured, Mrs. Fraser, that there are no dangers for him in his present place of abode. As soon as it can be done, measures will be taken to find the cowardly ruffian who made the assault and tried to steal your boy.

"Now, I leave you as a watcher during my absence; give George this medicine, speak a few words to him and then retire. He must be kept very quiet and free from agitation."

Hastening away, he found a messenger and quickly penned a note to Mrs. Hunter, who, having entire confidence in both "her boys," was satisfied with the explanation that "circumstances prevented him and George from calling to bid her good-by; but that they hoped to see her in a few days."

When little Donald was brought by Lily and Elsie to say good-by to Dudley, he found the child not nearly so nervous as he had expected, although there was a painful tremor about his mouth as he asked, "why that man should want to run off with him."

Dudley told him that George had had a fall and was somewhat hurt, and that he must try to do without his mother for a little while, because she wanted to stay with his friend until he was better. He added that, if possible, they would find the man who was trying to steal him and have him punished. His words satisfied the child entirely, and he quite understood why he could not see Mrs. Hunter for a few days and why she could not be told of the accident to her son.

Deciding to remain over until the next day to see what George's condition was, he hastened back to the cottage, where Mrs. Fraser was faithfully watching the sleeper. As everything seemed to be progressing favorably there, he went out and made inquiries which he thought might lead to the discovery of the ruffian. This man, as he now had no doubt, was an accomplice of Captain Fraser, who had somehow traced his wife to Long Branch.

She had found employment as a companion to an invalid lady, and a temporary home for herself and her child, through answering an advertisement that had appeared on the day when she fled from her home. The answer was to be in person, and the lady was so pleased with Mrs. Fraser's refined and attractive appearance that she at once engaged her and they had left New York immediately.

The cottage was near the beach, and Donald found constant delight in the wonders of the ocean. He never ventured far away from the house, and seemed to realize that there was at hand some danger which caused his mother constant uneasiness. He ran to her at her slightest call, and seemed instinctively to know that she was in special need of comfort.

He had been very happy, making a collection of shells and curious stones, and had just added a fresh supply to his store when he had been seized, in the very sight of his mother, who was smilingly watching him from a window.

As Mrs. Fraser sat by George's side, she began to look back upon the events of the past few weeks, recalling her tired, lonely life; the glad surprise when George came to her home, and the pleasant prospects which he had set before her. Then she shuddered as she lived over again her sharp surprise and alarm when she saw her husband's advertisement for her; the hurried preparations for departure, and the sinking of heart that had come with the realization that she could not enter the home just opening to receive her.

She did not know either George's or his mother's address. Even if she should be able to find it and go to Mrs. Hunter, her husband might pursue her there. She felt that she must flee at once. She had entirely forgotten the card left by Dudley.

The landlady proved to be very kind, and willing to accommodate the party; and after Dudley had sent Mrs. Fraser to obtain much needed rest, he took his post in the sick-room for the night.

A strange train of circumstances seemed to thwart his plans and hinder his work, and yet they were apparently working out a purpose.

He felt that something must be done at once to put an end to the persecutions by Captain Fraser, either in his own person or through accomplices, both for the sake of Mrs. Hunter—his second mother, whose life hung on so frail a thread—and for that of poor, distressed Ellen, who was worse than widowed.

Dudley decided that if George's condition were improved on the morrow he would at once leave him in care of his aunt and seek legal advice and authority to proceed in the matter.

That the captain was ready to stoop to any villainy in order to accomplish his end Dudley had no doubt. He desired to do nothing that would expose either Mrs. Hunter or Mrs. Fraser to the public gaze, yet something must be done and done quickly.

CHAPTER XIII

GEORGE'S illness proved to be serious, and Dudley was obliged to leave his home work in other hands and devote himself to his friend. He had never fully realized before what George's friendship meant to him, and how poor the world would seem without him. When at last the "danger point" was passed, and his mother had become exceedingly anxious to see her son and as to what business could possibly detain him so long, she received the reassuring message that, though he was not very well, he hoped to be with her in a few days.

When Mrs. Hunter first saw Donald she had come down to the veranda, lured by Lily, on the plea that she needed change.

The little fellow was sitting near her, and she spoke admiringly of the beautiful child, saying that he reminded her strangely of some one she had seen. When he arose and passed her, with a winning smile and a nod to Lily, she was charmed with the sweet face, and full of tender sympathy for his lameness.

"Who is that child, I wonder?" she said. "Surely I have seen a face like that somewhere.'

"He is a guest here, I believe," replied Lily.

A message from George was just then brought to her, saying, "Expect me to-morrow, dear mother. I will bring Ellen and her child with me."

She was so much excited by this news that Dudley, who had brought the note, said:

"Mother, you must rest now, to be ready for the morrow. Take these drops and lie down a while. We cannot have you ill on the day of the family reunion."

She yielded, allowing him to assist her to her room, and saying, "You will come too, Dudley, will you not?"

"Most assuredly I will," he replied. "I look forward to this holiday as one of the best of my life."

He made arrangements to be at the hotel early in the day, knowing how restlessly uneasy Mrs. Hunter would be until she had seen all her dear ones.

First, George came, who, although a little paler than usual, was now recovered from his illness.

Although chiding him that he did not let her know at once when he felt ill, she rejoiced greatly over his return, and said, "Now, when I see Ellen and her child, my cup of happiness will be full."

Dudley, who entered just then, said, "I have brought Mrs. Fraser and Donald, mother. Will you promise me to try not to become excited?"

"I will surely try, dear."

The sight of her sister-in-law so unnerved Ellen, however, that she threw herself on her knees at Hrs. Hunter's side and cried out, "Oh, Dora, my dear sister, have I found you at last?"

The effect on Mrs. Hunter was wonderful. As the poet truly says: "'Tis very good for strength to know that some one needs us to be strong." She became calm at once, and, with tenderest touches on the bowed head, besought her sister to control herself and to thank God for this blessed meeting.

"Dear Ellen, how I have longed for your return!" she said. "Where is your child? I must see him, too. My heart has yearned for him ever since I knew that you possessed such a treasure."

"I am here, auntie," said Donald, coming forward and standing smilingly before her.

With a bewildered look, she turned to Lily and said, "Why, this is the child I saw on the veranda!" Then, with a sob, she gathered him to her bosom.

When Mrs. Hunter tried to discover something more of Ellen's past life, she evaded her questions, saying, "Let us not look to-day at the clouds from which we have emerged, sister Dora. Let us enjoy the pleasant sunshine. Some other day when we are both stronger, I will tell you my history—so far as one who, like you, has been surrounded by love always, can bear to look upon it. Mine is a sad story. My girlish folly has been sorely punished."

NO MEDICINE

But a Change of Food Gave Relief

Many persons are learning that drugs are not the thing to rebuild worn out nerves, but proper food is required.

There is a certain element in the cereals, wheat, barley, etc., which is grown there by nature for food to brain and nerve tissue. This is the phosphate of potash, of which Grape-Nuts food contains a large proportion.

In making this food all the food elements in the two cereals, wheat and barley, are retained. That is why so many heretofore nervous and run down people find in Grape-Nuts a true nerve and brain food.

"I can say that Grape-Nuts food has done much for me as a nerve renewer, writes a Wis. bride:

"A few years ago, before my marriage, I was a bookkeeper in a large firm. "I became so nervous toward the end of each week that it seemed I must give up my position, which I could not afford to do.

"Mother purchased some Grape-Nuts and we found it not only delicious but I noticed from day to day that I was improving until I finally realized I was not nervous any more.

"I have recommended it to friends as a brain and nerve food, never having found its equal. I owe much to Grape-Nuts as it saved me from a nervous collapse, and enabled me to retain my position."

The Slough of Despond*

PROBABLY none of the metaphors or tropes with which Bunyan has crowded his wonderful allegory are more commonly employed in our daily speech and writing than that of "the Slough of Despond." This is because it expresses a universal human experience.

All wise people, and especially some of the newer sects, attribute the occasional despondency which attacks the best among us, to ill health. Indigestion and overwork are no doubt responsible for most of our depression. After a good night's sleep, the mocking impossibilities of the night before usually vanish into thin air. The lesson is patent that the care of the health should be paramount with those who would preserve their energy and good spirits. The habitual use of stimulants, such as tobacco or alcohol, both of which have harmful reactions; late hours; rich food, or over-eating; unnecessary exposure; all sorts of silly risks, such as young people are constantly tempted to take, should be avoided, as sinful taxes upon the health. A strong constitution may endure abuse for a while, but a breakdown must come before the normal time to eyes, hearing, digestion or nerves from any sort of unwise habit of body. It is the little foxes that spoil the vines in the physical world as surely as in that of mind and morals.

When we read the life of John Bunyan, full of disease and imprisonment and sorrow, we understand well that he could write, as could few others, of the Slough of Despond. The wonder is that he could depict so cheerfully Christian's escape therefrom. It is a triumph of religious faith.

The persistency of the heroes of history, in the midst of their discouragements, has been the secret of their success. Not one of them has escaped the awful slough. Read their lives. See how they have been encompassed with difficulties, and how they have faltered and despaired. Then mark how they have laid hold on God's promises, agonized in prayer, and felt the saving power from above.

It has been said that the two greatest religions for surmounting depression and sadness are Buddhism and Christianity. Their methods, however, are essentially different. The Buddhist stifles all human longings, and desires only to lose himself in the universal forgetfulness of Nirvana. The Christian says, "I must not desire less, but more of life. By trust in God, and by serving mankind, I may rise above my trouble." Which is the nobler?

Professor James, our greatest metaphysician, says that the way out of the Slough of Despond is only through religious faith. "The turbulent billows of the fretful surface leave the deep parts of the ocean undisturbed, and to him who has a hold of vaster and more permanent realities, the hourly vicissitudes of his personal destiny seem relatively insignificant."

Nobody knows the anguish of soul through which Thomas John Barnardo, "the Father of Nobody's Children," attained to his wonderful success. He began out of love and pity to gather friendless little ones into a bleak barn, and to feed and teach them. He did not see how he was to go further. He testifies that all was black before his eyes—but God led him out of the darkness into the light, until he saved tens of thousands of boys and girls from poverty and vice, and set their feet upon the rock, Christ Jesus.

*Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, February 21. Topic: Pilgrim's Progress Series. II. "The Slough of Despond." Ps. 69: 1-4, 13-18; 40: 1-3.

Discipleship*

THE great test which the Master applied to his disciples was fruit-bearing. They must work his works. They must follow him, which meant that they must labor incessantly for the good of others. They must be to him as the branches to the vine. They can bear fruit, but only when they abide in the vine, so that its life and their life are one.

The great, transcendent proof of this abiding is, naturally, soul-winning. The object of Christianity is the conversion of the whole world to Christ. If each Christian could but succeed, by God's help, in winning but a single soul for Christ each year, what glorious progress would be made! If each Christian could win ten others yearly, those now in middle life might almost live to see the millennium.

Horace Bushnell sets forth very beautifully, in his book entitled Christian Nurture, the gradual turning of the well-born soul to Christ. His conversion should be simply a normal growth. All the children in Christian homes should thus be gathered into the great fold.

But this, says the Rev. Charles McKinley in his interesting book upon Educational Evangelism, is a view which fails in its practical application. The children of Christian homes seem to be almost as liable to go astray as those of a different upbringing. They need careful teaching, anxious prayer, constant watchfulness on the part of the parents; and the sort of education which means, says President Butler, of Columbia, "a gradual adjustment to the spiritual possessions of the race."

We teach and teach
Until, like drumming pedagogues, we lose
The thought that what we teach has higher ends
Than being taught and learned.

This lesson we especially need to remember in the Sunday School. No teacher should be satisfied until every soul in his class is won for Christ.

It sometimes seems as though it were daily becoming harder and harder to discuss religion with the irreligious. You love your friend. You wish to have him converted to Christ. You pray for him, but you feel that you should also talk with him. You do not know how to begin. You are afraid that he will ridicule you. You take refuge in the common plea, "I fear I shall do more harm than good," and you say nothing. Your friend goes on in the shadowy, perilous way, perhaps never to find the Saviour.

The only light and strength for such labor as this must come through prayer. By prayer cometh faith.

Charles Kingsley, in his story of Alton Locke, describing Eleanor's testimony to Jesus, says: "She talked of him as Mary would have talked, just risen from his feet. The sense of her own intense belief, shining out in every lineament of her face, carried conviction to my heart more than ten thousand arguments could do. It must be true."

The modern conversion is likely to be less emotional than in the former times. The poet Cowper says of his own, "My eyes filled with tears and my voice choked with transport. I could only look up to heaven in silent fear." In these days, men are more likely to be deeply persuaded through the understanding than through the feelings; but the method is comparatively unimportant, so long as the man is won to the service of the Master.

BOTH GAINED

By Change to Postum

"We have given Postum over a year's trial," writes a Wis. lady, "and our only regret is that we did not try it before. Previously we used coffee twice a day and were very fond of it.

"My husband had been subject to severe attacks of sick headache for years and at such times could not endure the sight or smell of coffee. This led me to suspect that coffee was the cause of his trouble.

"I was also troubled very much with acidity of the stomach and heart palpitation after meals. I had been doctoring for this, but had not suspected that coffee was the cause.

"Finally we purchased some Postum and it did for me what the medicines had failed to do. The first day we used Postum I noticed less of my own trouble, the second day was entirely free from it and have never been troubled since.

"My husband has been entirely free from attacks of sick headache since he quit coffee and began to use Postum.

"I have heard people say they did not like the flavor of Postum, yet I have served it to them without detection, because it has the color and snappy coffee taste, similar to mild high-grade Java. This shows they had not made it right. When made according to directions on pkg., it is as delicious as coffee and besides it is wholesome."

Winning Over African Kings

I first visited Gondanzora's kraal in April, 1906, arranging to send a native preacher to them every Sunday. On a later visit, at the request of the young men, I suggested that a station be opened there. Gondanzora and his men were standing close by, one of them holding a half-grown pig. The chief stood up, and said, "This is what Gondanzora has to say: This missionary came to us, sent us a preacher, and we ask if we may now have a teacher here all the time. The young men want it, and the old will not object. I will receive the mission and the missionary as our friend." With that I was presented with the pig. That was a happy night for Makoni's people. Late as it was, the Christians with me started the people singing hymns, and we preached to them. In a few weeks the entire kraal had become believers. One hundred and twenty-five were attending school and over 500 the regular services.

At the Nehakanana's kraal, which was next opened at the request of a son and daughter of the old chief, we placed Stephen Mari and his wife, native converts, in charge of the spiritual work. At Vumbunu's kraal, eight miles distant, Samuel Matimba, another native convert, was put in charge. And so with a number of other kraals, where the workers have had a cordial welcome and where many souls are being won to the Master.

There are many admirable characters among the native converts. One headman, a big induna named Varunga, has become a powerful and eloquent preacher of the Gospel.

Among the strange tragedies of heathenism which the missionary frequently encounters one may be mentioned. A chieftainess of the Manicus, named Muredzwa, was struck by her husband, who was intoxicated with "doro." Native law says that any one who strikes a chief (man or woman) must be killed or have his eyes put out. In this instance the latter punishment was chosen and the husband's eyes were gouged out with pointed sticks. He was then sent from the kraal. Muredzwa exercised the native right to choose another to be her husband.

Let Us Help You To Be A Manufacturer And Factory Owner

YOU CAN OWN A FACTORY LIKE THIS

Under Our New Plan We Give You Tools And Equipment FREE

We Will Start You in the Canvas Glove Business and give you without cost the necessary tools, simply with the understanding that you buy supplies and material from us so long as our prices are as low or lower than you can get elsewhere.

Immense Profits are made in this fascinating business. The McCreery Brothers started only a few years ago without a cent. They actually borrowed $100 to start with. Today they have thousands of dollars. They own their own large factory, have extensive interests in others, and do an enormous business. They have started a few other men in the glove business, and they will help you to start too, furnishing you with tools and equipments free, and teaching you the secrets of the business.

Our New Plan makes it easy for any man to start in business for himself. We give you free the necessary tools, such as expensive handmade dies, cutting table, maple cutting block, turning machine, cloth rack, rawhide maul, knife, pattern and equipment. No matter how small or how large your town—no matter what section you live in—there is always room for a factory. Any merchant can make the gloves he sells himself, and soon be making gloves for other stores.

No Experience is required. We teach you the secrets of the business and furnish you tools and equipments free. We have taken men who had never had a day's practical business experience, and started them on the road to wealth. These men started in a modest way, but soon built large factories work lots of help, have a big stock of cloth and machinery on hand and a good balance in the bank. What these men have done, you can do.

Unlimited Demand — There is no class of goods for which there is such a steady demand as for canvas gloves and mittens. They are the popular glove for the masses. Everybody uses them—the farmer, the mechanic, the doctor, the lawyer, the merchant, the laborer—in all sections of the country—from Maine to California, and from Minnesota to the Gulf. There is actually room today for ten canvas glove factories where we only have one now.

Our interesting book which we send free. Write for it.

We Mean Business when we say we furnish tools free, we mean exactly what we say. All we ask is that you buy your cloth from us, but we don't even ask that unless we can furnish it as low or lower prices than you can buy elsewhere.

Don't Miss This opportunity, even if you have to borrow the small amount of money necessary to buy a stock of cloth to start with. You should be able to pay it back in a very short time and have money in the bank besides. There will be many fortunes made in the canvas glove business in the next few years. You can start a factory in any spare room at home, or small store room, and enlarge it as your business demands.

This Liberal Offer Your Stepping Stone to Success

We Start You in a business of your own, right in your own town. Every man, no matter how humble, is entitled to at least the profits of his own labor. If you have the ambition to better your condition—to be somebody —to provide for yourself and family—to enjoy success, happiness and prosperity —we can help you.

Come With Us and let us start you in this profitable, legitimate business, which, with a reasonable amount of light work and attention, should make you a prosperous factory owner in a very short time. The small amount of money which is required to be invested (from $50 upwards) is spent entirely for cloth, supplies and other necessities of the business. We furnish you the tools and equipment free. There is no waste material, no dead stock. Every yard of cloth can be turned back into cash.

OPPORTUNITY IS KNOCKING AT YOUR DOOR

Here Is a Chance where you can with our help start on an honorable career as a successful business man. You cannot possibly lose any time by investigation, and it may mean great financial success for you. Do not delay. Today the opportunity is open to you; tomorrow may be too late. Our ability to assist others in starting factories is limited to our ability to furnish them with raw material, and just as soon as enough have become associated with us to absorb our capital, we shall be obliged to withdraw this offer. IT IS SO VERY EASY TO GET THE FULL DETAILS OF OUR PROPOSITION. SIMPLY SIGN AND SEND US THE COUPON.

"As Unto Me"

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, once again
There comes across the seas a cry of pain;
From Italy's fair shores peals forth the cry
Of bitter, woeful, human agony.

Yet once again is sent to us this plea:
"O HERALD readers, give your sympathy!
Ye who have others aided oft, of yore,
Send help to us, we pray you, from your store!"

This is their plea, so pitiful, so true—
O brothers, sisters, list! What will you do?
Will you not swift respond, to send them aid?
"Who giveth quick, gives twice," 'tis truly said.

We who have homes, and kindred by our side,
Shall we not think of those whose kin have died?
Crushed by the crumbling walls and quaking earth,
Parents have lost the children they gave birth.

Husbands and wives are parted, never more
To meet on sunny Italy's bright shore;
And lovers, brothers, sisters, friends are lost;
And homes are wrecked, alas! a mighty host.

O HERALD readers! let us speed our aid
With willing hand and heart; for God hath made
All flesh our kin—"He made them of our blood"—
In Him we are one common brotherhood.

And God will drop his blessing, as the dew,
Upon the head of all whose heart is true.
Lift up the drooping head, the feeble knee,
And you shall hear, "Ye did it unto Me."

JENNIE WILSON-HOWELL.

The Seattle Totem Pole

EDITOR CHRISTIAN HERALD: In an article entitled "Seattle and the Totem Pole," in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 6, it is stated that two Indian chiefs came to Seattle and took the pole back with them—to Alaska—besides several thousand dollars in damages they had recovered by their suit. The facts are these: After the Indians discovered the loss of their totem pole they served notice upon the trespassers, demanding its return and $2,500 as damages. Their demands at first were treated with derision, but after eight of the excursionists had been indicted in an Alaskan court, a compromise was effected by paying $500 to the tribe that owned the pole. It still stands on a public square in Seattle. The writer resided in that city and was present during the presentation ceremonies. This totem pole is more than fifty feet high and about four feet in diameter at the foot. It is supported by another pole planted in the ground and fitted into the side that was hollowed out. The first figure at the top is a large bird, with a long beak. The second is that of a man holding a frog by the legs; then a bear, below this another bird, under this a whale, and at the bottom is an eagle with a man's head—the grinning mouth showing a double row of white teeth.

This pole is a great curiosity to visitors, who, as a rule, will halt when they first see it and, with open-mouthed astonishment, gaze at its grotesque figures and then burst out laughing. J. G. WEBB.

Cultivate Beauty

Of Face, Eyes, Hair, Teeth, Hands, Nails, etc.

—and on this." —HAMLET

The Beauty that develops with the years is within the reach of everyone who cares for it enough to cultivate it.

JUST AS YOU would cultivate beauty in art, music, literature, or in your home.

You can have a clear skin, rosy cheeks, clear, expressive eyes; glossy, abundant hair, eyebrows and eyelashes; soft, white hands; shapely nails, well manicured; healthy, shapely feet. You can fill out hollows and take off superfluous flesh.

No woman's skin needs to be pimpled, wrinkled, dry or sallow. Age should mean merely an expression of matured beauty.

Self-Study a Duty

You can be wholesome and attractive. It is the result of that self-same study which is the duty of every woman who aspires to be her best. No woman can afford to neglect the dainty little accessories necessary to her womanly charm. I teach you the scientific care of hair, complexion, teeth, hands, etc. I have no preparations to sell you, but I enable you to select those which are best for you. This will save you much time and money in experimenting with face creams, cosmetics, drugs, powders, etc., which may be injurious to your individual condition.

My work is that of an instructor; I study your case with you and help you to make the very most of your own features and personality.

I will cheerfully tell you about my methods and this course of lessons.

Write to me the particular things you would like to accomplish and I will tell you what I can do for you. I never treat a pupil I cannot help.

The First Christian Martyr

By Mrs. M. Baxter

PERSECUTION is amongst the blessings of Christianity; "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." The blessing is not simply an expected, but a present one. "Blessed are they," "Theirs is the kingdom of heaven." The poor blind world imagines that the followers of Jesus forego, with some difficulty, the pleasures of earth for the sake of a reward more or less certain hereafter, and many of them say in their hearts, "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," and they think they are really better off than God's people. But, oh, how blind they are! To one who is entirely given up to God, everything comes in the way of blessing, because it comes from a Father's hand. He cannot be persecuted without the precious sweetness of knowing it is for Jesus and with Jesus that he suffers, and he would not exchange such suffering for all the joy the world could give.

Instead of being occupied with the personal wrong which was done to him, Stephen, more alive to the presence of God than to that of man, and seeking by any means to bring his judges into direct contact with God, stood ready and fearless to make his defense as soon as he should be called upon to do so. The high priest called upon him to answer his accusers.

"Are these things so?" It was an unusual defense which was made by this man "full of faith and of the Holy Ghost." Not one word of apology, excuse, or self-defense. Rising altogether above the circumstances in which he was placed, he took the position of accuser instead of accused; instead of pleading his own cause, he pleaded that of his injured God and his crucified and risen Saviour. To him it was a matter of no concern whether he was condemned or acquitted, whether he lived or died; the opinion of no man present was to him a priceless object, and putting himself and his interests and safety entirely on one side, he sought their good alone. Oh, for such a spirit now! Was it not unwise of Stephen to have gone thus in the very face of the prejudices of those to whom he spoke? No, he had counted the cost; led by the Holy Ghost, he followed, regardless of what the consequences might be to himself; he was animated by no ill-feeling toward his accusers, but he knew that they were self-deceived, and needed rousing; and most effectually he roused them: "When they heard these things, they were cut to the heart; and they gnashed on him with their teeth."

But his work was done; it cost him his life, but he died victorious; those hearts which had received a sword-cut from the Word of God could be healed only in one way, and that was by Jesus himself. Many a life has been lost over some paltry political question, or some strife about territory; but here was a noble object—the awakening and salvation of souls which were crusted over with pharisaical self-righteousness.

But oh, how different was his death from that of the prophet Zechariah under similar circumstances! Under the dispensation of the law the martyr said, when he was stoned, "The Lord look upon it, and require it" (II. Chron. 24:22). But Stephen—looking into the open heaven, even after the fatal stones had blinded him, for his spirit saw Jesus—cried, saying, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." And he kneeled down and cried, with a loud voice, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge."

Thoughts of vengéance did not exist in Stephen; he saw the hands which threw the stones only as instruments permitted by God; how be angry with them? He died in a spirit of self-sacrifice for them, and only love reigned in his heart, because Jesus, his Divine Lord, had full possession.

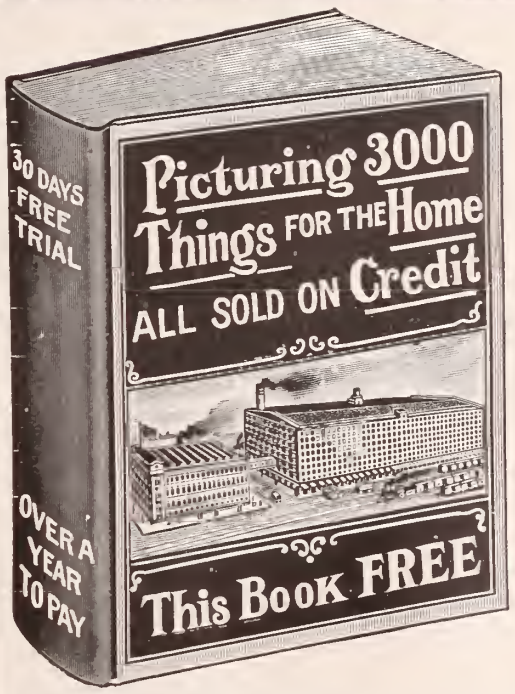
Our 1909 Book—Newer Styles—Lower Prices



SEND NO MONEY—NO STAMPS Simply mail us the coupon printed below. Or write us a postal, if you prefer. We will then mail you this great book, now fresh from the presses, picturing more than 3,000 new-style things for the home. A part of the pictures are in actual colors. This book shows a greater variety of Furniture, Carpets and Housefurnishings than is shown in any retail store in Chicago. On each article it quotes a price lower than you ever saw. It shows the newest creations in furniture, draperies, etc. And it offers you credit on everything. Have whatever you want, at our lowest cash prices, and pay us a little each month.

WE TRUST YOU FOR

Furniture, Carpets—Rugs, Silverware, Chinaware, Lamps—Clocks, Refrigerators, Sewing Machines, Washing Machines, Talking Machines, Pianos—Stoves, Baby Carriages, Draperies, Etc.

We sell goods on credit at lower prices than ever were quoted for cash. You can have these home comforts now, and begin at once to enjoy them. No need to wait for the money. Simply pay as you can. We charge no interest and ask no security. Our dealings are all confidential. Any person who wants to make home more attractive is the right sort of person, and his credit is good with us.

OVER A YEAR TO PAY

Pay a few cents down on each dollar. Then take the goods, use and enjoy them, and pay us a little each month. On the average, we allow a year to pay. On pianos, two years. If misfortune comes, or loss of work, we do what we can to help out. Our whole effort, from the time you first deal with us, is to make you a permanent customer. And you will be. You will never buy housefurnishings elsewhere, and pay others' prices, after you once deal with us.

30 DAYS' FREE TRIAL

Whatever you select can be used for one month before you decide to buy it. Every article is sent on approval. You not only see it, but use it. You compare it with other similar articles, and compare our prices with others. If the article, for any reason, is unsatisfactory, simply send it back. You are under no obligation. The month's use will not cost you one penny.

FACTORY CASH PRICES

Cash mail order houses will try to convince you that credit costs more than cash. See for yourself if it does. Get our catalog and compare the prices. See who sells the lowest. The fact is, we sell on credit exactly as low as for cash. Our cash customers get not a penny of discount. To all we sell at factory prices, plus our one small profit. No middlemen of any kind get profit on our goods. We defy any other mail order house to show one price as low as we offer on a similar piece.

SAVING OF 15 TO 50%

We guarantee on every article a saving of 15 to 50%. We don't refer to your local store prices, for they are enormously high. We refer to catalog houses, selling for cash, and claiming to undersell us. Get our goods on trial. If you don't find that we undersell everyone else, simply send our goods back. Ask others to send goods on approval, as we do, and keep those which cost the least.

CAPITAL $7,000,000

This is the largest concern of its kind in existence. Our combined capital is $7,000,000. We have 450,000 customers. Our mail order buildings cover six acres of ground. In addition, we own 25 mammoth retail stores, in the heart of the largest cities, where we meet the fiercest competition in America. The only way in which we have grown to this size is by underselling all competition. Now we dominate the field. We control the output of scores of factories, and our enormous buying power enables us to practically fix our own costs. It would bankrupt any lesser concern to attempt to meet our prices.

You may pay cash if you want to, but we have no discount for cash. You may as well buy on credit, as half of the world is doing. You gain nothing by paying cash.

THE FIGHT TO SAVE THE FORESTS

"THEY shall cut down her forests." That was one of the curses prophesied by Jeremiah against Egypt, and it has been well said: "What sort of a curse that was we shall begin ourselves to realize if we continue to destroy the covering of our mountains."

This question of preserving and perpetuating the forests of America, and what it means to the future of the country, has reached and aroused the thinking people of the land. Divers groups have been formed for action and powerful agencies have been called into existence for the preservation of the God-given resources of the nation.

Foremost among the factors for forest preservation is the great and growing Forest Service of the United States, which was inaugurated less than a decade ago, as a division of the United States Department of Agriculture. Its broad purpose is the promotion of forestry throughout the whole country "for every practical purpose and for the benefit of all." It is not only a bureau of information about trees and woods, but a bureau of demonstration as well. It sends its men to assist in maintaining a steady growth of forest trees in wooded areas, and to give instruction in the science of taking the income from the forests and leaving the capital intact.

Wood preservation and wood utilization are subjects of special investigation by the Forest Service in its various experiment stations, its helpful aim being to reduce waste and gather knowledge of the supply and consumption of wood in the United States. All this valuable information is widely diffused through its own and other publications, which reach an average, it is estimated, of over nine million readers monthly. Advice is also given by letter to correspondents on every phase of the subject, including the management of woodlands, forest planting, methods of handling, seasoning, manufacturing and using woods, and the extraction and manufacture of other forest products. The woodlands of the country are very largely in the hands of small owners, who, it seems, have little knowledge of practical forestry; and the wood and water users include, in one way or another, all classes and occupations.

Co-operative State studies are carried on at the request of States such as New Hampshire, which appropriated $7,000, and California, $25,000. The Forest Service stands ready to co-operate with individuals or groups, especially when its assistance will result in setting up object lessons to serve as encouraging examples for the general benefit. Its own greatest object lesson is the management of the national forests, about which the work of the Forest Service has centred since 1905; and the growth of which constitutes a wonderful story of discovery and development.

The various Forest Schools which have sprung up during the last few years are also powerful factors for forest preservation. They are equipping and sending out trained men to enter the Forest Service of the United States, and to become instructors in forestry. The Yale, Harvard and University of Michigan Forest Schools and the Biltmore Forest School, North Carolina, give degrees in forestry. So does the Pennsylvania State College Forest School. And a score or more of State Agricultural Colleges are now preparing these skilled protectors of the forest for their beneficial and valuable service.

Organized bodies are conducting a lively campaign for the special purpose of awakening public sentiment in regard to the menace of forest destruction. Chief among these is the American Forestry Association, headed by Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture; keeping up an agitation, in the face of disheartening public indifference, for the intelligent preservation and cultivation of precious forest growths. The National Forestry Committee of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, headed by Mrs. P. S. Peterson, of Chicago, with local committees in all parts of the country, is alert to prevent the destruction of roadside trees by trolley and telephone companies, and to note opportunities for tree planting in barren school yards and unsightly sections, on Arbor Day and all occasions. The International Society of Arboriculture (General William J. Palmer, of Colorado Springs, Colo., president) and the Society of American Foresters (Gifford Pinchot, president) are also notably active in the work of forest preservation. Better legislation is the aim of all the factors for forest perpetuation. This desired legislation includes statutes setting apart public lands as forest reserves, with provisions for their proper maintenance, the enactment of good fire laws,

Triumphs of the Believer

TEXT—Gal. 6 : 14

VERY singular indeed is the contrast presented between human nature in the man of the world and the same human nature in the man of God. In the former, we see great pretension and great weakness; in the latter, great humility and great strength. Look at the great pretensions which the man of the world will put forth; he will talk to you largely of the perfectibility of human nature; of the capacity of man's intellect, the force of his will, the beauty of his moral graces; and yet when you come to examine the creature who is the subject of all these pretensions, you find him to be, in every possible relation, far below them. You find him with a will not steady enough to guide his own impulses; with an intellect perverted by partiality and prejudice; with affections directed to those things which he himself condemns—in short, such a strange mixture of incongruous elements, of strength and weakness, nobility and meanness, as it would have been impossible for us to conceive, if we had not had the living examples before our eyes. On the other hand, you find the man of God to have but a low estimate of himself, to put his trust only in the vicarious merits of another, to derive his strength solely from the power of the Holy Spirit, and himself to be, as he will candidly tell you, a creature all weakness, sin and ignorance. And yet, trace that man's inward life, or trace him even in his outward conduct in the world, and you will find him, by the power of divine grace, above his pretensions; firm of will, resolute of purpose, strong in principle, high in hope, undaunted in courage, presenting in his daily conduct qualities altogether worthy of admiration and love. In short, that perfection of human nature which the man of the world claims, the man of God exhibits; not absolutely, but in a degree which human nature never has attained, except after the example of Him who in his own person presented it pure and blameless before the throne of God. The Gospel makes a man to be not a mean, soulless, spiritless creature, full of grief, despondency and sorrow; but it makes him a being full of intrepid and noble power, all love and animation, an admirable creature, a wonder even to his own eyes. And as is the Christian's inward state, so is his outward condition. He does not pass through the world the sport of chance, like some dismasted ship tossed hither and thither by the tempest. He is not the plaything of some blind fatality, struggling how he may through life's scenes, without any definite principle of action or ground of hope; but he goes on with clear knowledge and firm guidance, and an unshaken purpose, through all life's stormy elements, like the stately vessel that battles with the strong deep, and moves unerringly on through wind and wave toward her harbor. Brethren, would you desire to see human nature in this state of its perfection? Would you desire yourselves to attain to that condition of which you feel it to be capable? Do not put away the thought.

Holiness is Heavenborn

God bids not so. He encourages the holy ambition, but he points you there where alone it can be obtained. You and I may have about us this beauty of holiness, but not in ourselves, or of ourselves. It must be heaven-born, not earth-born; given by the Spirit, not native to the flesh; caught from the grace of God, not won by the will of man. Here is the bond which makes men great, because it unites them to that Redeemer who is himself all strength, truth, wisdom and glory. How strange to the natural mind appear the means by which the dignity is to be acquired! Not in the arena of the world's conquest, not in the pomp of the world's pride, not in the acclamation of the world's applause; but go to that solemn hill where the sun has become at noonday pale, where the quivering earth speaks of her terror, and the panic-stricken multitude gaze alarmed at their own act. Go to the hill of Calvary, and you will find it at the foot of the Cross of the dying Redeemer. Yes, we will glory; for there we see joy, strength, honor, dignity, power. But whence do we derive them? "God forbid that we should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto us, and we unto the world."

*Pastor of St. James Episcopal Church, Ridgefield, N. J.

The subject suggested by these words is the triumph of the believer, and I ask your attention, first, to its true nature; second, its effects and evidences.

First. Its true nature. "We glory in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." And here let us notice, in the first place, the meaning of the word "glory"—a word of frequent use in the Scriptures. Thus in I. Cor. 1:31, "He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord," is put in opposition to any person "having confidence in himself." "Let no flesh glory in His presence." So, in the third chapter of the same epistle, "Therefore let no man glory in man, for all things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come, all are yours; and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's." The word glory, therefore, while it expresses some ground for congratulation, does not express that mere fluttering of the heart which men are apt to experience in the possession of some earthly object, but rather a glory which has reasons, and at once appeals to the affections and satisfies the mind. Moreover, the word means, in its actual force of the original Greek, not merely a triumph in something present, but a confidence in that which is to come. It implies some sure hope on which the soul can rest, and gaze undismayed and unalarmed at all the changes and chances of the future.

Glorying in the Cross

Then observe how completely the grounds of this hope are taken from something altogether outside ourselves. It is a pride—if, indeed, pride it can be justly called—it is a pride which teaches the deepest and profoundest humility. We glory, not in the sinner, but in the sinner's Saviour; nay, more; not merely in Jesus Christ our Lord, not merely in those parts of his person and office which may fascinate the imagination and strike the intellect—not, for instance, alone in the divinity of his nature, not in the majesty of his power, not in the number of those angels that wait upon his slightest word, not in the greatness of his mediatorial kingdom, vast even now, and still incomplete, not here, but in those parts of his work which directly contradict all the pride of the human heart, and all the natural wisdom of the human mind. "We glory in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ," in that Agony and Bloody Sweat, that Cross and Passion, in which our Lord bore the especial penalty of sin, and which never can be recalled to the soul, but that the soul recalls with it its transgression—the depth of that hopeless, helpless guilt from which none but he was mighty enough to save us. And that these are not the thoughts which are pleasant to the natural mind, witness the opposition; witness, if you like, the ridicule and scorn with which the wise men of the world are pleased to treat the doctrine of the atonement. "How strange!" they say; "how incredible! how preposterous! That the Son of God should die for man! Should suffer the death of a malefactor!" And yet, let them state the difficulty in all its breadth—let them put it in the strongest form they can find—we accept it all; and it is in that very incredible nature of the fact, as it seems to unenlightened reason—it is in that very wonder of Christ dying for man that we rest the firm and deep-seated foundations of our hope. For, brethren, when it is revealed—and it was too great and mysterious to be known till it was revealed—but when it was revealed, see if that doctrine does not satisfy even the intellect, as being most consonant to the nature of man, and to the attributes of God. Let us only suppose two simple principles, which I scarcely think that even the deist can deny. Let us suppose, in the first place, human sin; and this, at all events, is no subject for contempt, because even the intellectual Greeks believed it. And then let us take it, that this sin is opposed to God; and, therefore, that God is opposed to it. In other words, that God is just and true, as well as that he is good and merciful. Let us assume these two postulates, and then the doctrine of the atonement makes salvation possible, in a way which no system ever yet designed in the whole world could do. Nay, human systems do indeed put this difficulty aside altogether; and yet this is the great hypothesis of the Gospel. This is its great problem, How shall a great and holy God forgive sin? The doctrine of the atonement does answer it, and nothing else does or can answer it. And therefore "we glory in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ," because in it we emerge from a state of hopeless condemnation into that of children reconciled. How vast the difference! How vast the price! The difference absolute as that which parts hell from heaven, from condemnation to acceptance, from despair to hope, from death to life, from agony to joy and peace and glory, from the companionship of devils to that of angels and archangels and the spirits of the just made perfect, the beatific vision of God, and all the glorious fruitions of heaven. If eternal life, if undecaying youth, if joy that never palls and wearies, if these be the objects of ambition, then let us glory in this state; yea, glory in it the more, because it is not purchased by our own works of righteousness, but is the gift of the living God, through the merits of his dear Son. Here, brethren, is the crowning wonder—the vastness of its price! No mind of man, nay, no mind of created angel, though it should dwell upon the topic ages after ages in adoring meditation, could ever fathom it; for what created being can understand the fulness of the Deity? can measure that glory in which, from everlasting to everlasting, before the world began, dwelt the eternal Son—the mysterious union and communion of Father, Son and Holy Ghost, "blessed for evermore." And failing to measure this, who can measure the descent of the Incarnation; or, failing to measure this, the unfathomable love that condescended to it? What mind, unless that mind were infinite, can fathom the agonies of our Lord's soul, brought, for three and thirty years, into contact with those contaminations of human sin, which must have been to his righteous spirit abhorrent beyond measure? Who can judge of his sufferings, when the accumulated guilt of the world lay upon his soul, and he felt himself forsaken of God and man? Oh, none, none but he who is himself the Son of God can measure it. And have not the Father and the Holy Spirit witnessed to it? The Father when he raised Him on the third day from the dead—the Spirit when, with signs, and wonders, and miracles, and converting influences, he has wrought for nineteen hundred years in the souls of men the acceptance of this priceless sacrifice. The angels, they too can measure something of it; for they know more than we do; and they have watched and wondered—they have marveled and ministered to the heirs of this salvation. The saints in heaven can measure something of it, as they cast their crowns before the throne and the Lamb, and cry, "Worthy art thou to receive honor and glory; for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us with thy blood!" And cannot we ourselves taste something of it, when, as we gaze upon the cross, we feel an adoring love penetrating our inmost heart of hearts? Oh! eternity is too short, and heaven too poor, to measure it. And shall we not glory to be the subjects of such a system—the objects of such a love? What is there in the whole world, in its pomp, its show, its pride, its pleasures, its affections, its ambition, comparable to this? Let other men boast as they will—let them glory in their righteousness, their strength, their knowledge, their ambition. God has called us, my brethren, "out of darkness into light"; and "God forbid that we should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

A Triumph for Us and in Us

II. But, secondly, look at the effects and evidences of this triumph, because it is a triumph not only wrought for us, but wrought in us. We cannot be the servants of so great a Master, and not catch from him some reflected rays of his glory. And yet, how strange to human ears will appear the expressions of this triumph—"By whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world!" Ah, yes! Brought into a new state, must we not have hopes and affections suited to that state? And here indeed lies the power of this expression, because the word presents to us, not the severity of the contest we have to wage, but only the example of him who will enable us to wage it. Keen and sharp as to the shrinking flesh were the wounds of the nails, and all the lingering agonies of the earthly cross—let us not conceal the truth—so, to tear our hearts from the love of the world, to give up its

TO WELCOME HOME THE FLEET

AT historic Hampton Roads, on Monday, February 22, will be enacted an impressive naval spectacle. It will be the official "welcome home" for Uncle Sam's famous round-the-world fleet. Twenty-two first-class American battleships, steaming into the finest natural harbor in the world, will be a sight to arouse spectators to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. The anniversary of Washington's birthday is appropriate for this patriotic purpose, and no better setting could be provided than the site of the battle between the Monitor and Merrimac.

It was at first proposed that the final scene in the cruise of the battleships should be enacted in New York harbor. Sentiment was the foremost factor in the final decision, but there was also another consideration. The flower of the globe-trotting bluejackets from the battleships are to have the place of honor in the inaugural parade at Washington, which will escort President Taft from the Capitol to the White House, after he has taken the oath of office, and it will be a much simpler matter to transport these men from Hampton Roads to the capital and to return them to their ships after the inauguration than if the vessels were anchored at New York.

The fleet will be reviewed by President Roosevelt from the yacht Mayflower, and it is expected that the Chief Magistrate will be accompanied by President-elect Taft, the Secretary and Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Admiral Dewey and the naval officers of highest rank now detailed for shore duty, including Rear-Admiral Evans. It is expected that Mrs. Roosevelt and the wives of the members of the reviewing party will be included in the company on board the Mayflower. The President and his guests will leave Washington on February 21, steaming leisurely down the Potomac and Chesapeake Bay, and arriving at Hampton Roads early next morning. The battleships will steam past the Mayflower and drop anchor in Hampton Roads in a long, double row. Then will take place the real review. The Mayflower, with the President on the bridge, will steam up and down the double line of floating fortresses, receiving in turn from each a thunderous salute.

After the review, the President will receive the five admirals and the captains on board the Mayflower, and will entertain them at luncheon. In the late afternoon, the Presidential party will set sail for Washington. The battleships, or a major portion of them, will remain at Hampton Roads rendezvous for some days and this interval will be crowded with the gayest of social festivities.

The Battleship Fleet Off Colombo, Ceylon, en Route for Home

A considerable portion of the welcoming throng will be made up of the mothers, wives, daughters, sisters and sweethearts of the officers and men aboard the warships. When the fleet was on the Pacific coast, last year, a number of these relatives and friends journeyed to the west coast for a short visit with loved ones, and, in a few instances, the wives and daughters of officers followed the fleet around the globe; but most of the relatives will see their heroes for the first time in nearly a year when at the busy little dock at Old Point Comfort. Of course, this applies only to the mariners from the round-the-world fleet.

Admiral Arnold's squadron of our newest and finest battleships merely escorts the nomads from Gibraltar, and perforce these escort ships and their officers will merely shine by reflected glory as compared with the peaceful victors of three oceans, now back from their globe-belting voyage.

sins, and renounce its influences, to control its tempers, to die to its seductive fascinations, is a work hard and painful to the natural heart. There must be a spiritual crucifixion—we dead to the world, and the world dead to us, and, it may be, repaying upon us some portion of that scorn which it poured out upon our dying Master, when "they that passed by wagged their heads," and even the poor struggling wretches at his side cast, with their dying breath, reproaches in his teeth. All this may be, and is, sore and painful, but what then? If Christ needed to pass through it, shall we shrink from following Christ? Shall the narrowness of the road prevent us from walking with our Master in that "path of the just which shineth more and more unto the perfect day" of heaven? Oh! if Christ hath died, shall not we die with him? Yes, if needs be, die literally—if needs be, in very truth, like the apostles and martyrs, pour out our blood with our Redeemer. And yet it is not this literal death of which I now speak, but it is a crucifixion of the flesh with its lusts and appetites; and I may say that that crucifixion is the greatest, mightiest triumph that man has ever won. We are crucified to the flesh, not as the world's victims, but as the world's conquerors. We die to the world's hope, but not to all hope; we die to the world's pleasures, not to all pleasure—to the world's glory, not to all glory. We have a hope, a pleasure, and a glory, that Christ gives, "incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away." If we are lifted up, it is to look down upon the world, careless about its pleasures, and even indifferent to its pains, because we have in the heart that treasure of an inward peace, which the world never can take away. And is not this a cause why we should "glory"? Is it not to stand trimphant over all the world's trials and temptations? Sore and dark may be our earthly lot, dangerous as that troubled sea on which the disciples embarked; but we "know in whom we have believed"; and if his love watch, if his wisdom guide the bark, we will not, cannot, may not, dare to fear, but that he will waft it safely into the haven where our souls would rest. And when we have reached that happy land, the remembrance of the troubles through which we have passed will but add a new zest to its undecaying joys. As we sit down by the rivers of life, we shall review the past, it may be, with much the same feeling with which now in our manhood we look back with a smile of pleasant recollection to the little cares and griefs of our childhood. Memory, in the light of that cloudless world, will be rich in happy thoughts. That future clothes with something of its own radiance this present time. Brighter than all the world's glory shall be the glory of our Lord and Master. We are strong, and we never forget in whom. "God forbid that we should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto us, and we unto the world."

And now, in conclusion, a word of practical application. First of all, how different the temper here spoken of from the alarm and timid way in which Christians ordinarily make their confession before the world! Instead of glorying, are we not ashamed, too often, of the cross of our Master? Are we not afraid to witness before all mankind, in our conversation, that we are the meek and lowly followers of the meek and lowly Saviour? O short sighted faith! O doubting heart, that cannot look beyond the cross to see the glory of the crown; that cannot pierce the "valley of the shadow of death" to the bright shore where, clothed in glory, and honor, and immortality, Christ waits to receive us! Surely that is not the Christian heart, that is not the Christian temper. Oh, no! Let us witness to him in our life, our conduct, our objects, our temper, and our conversation, testifying before all the world that we count this our glory and honor, that Christ has died for us, and that we are dying with Christ, if so be that we may live and reign with him. Again, notice the close and unalterable connection of the two. We cannot part the cross from the crown—we must embrace them together, or renounce them together. To harmonize Christ and mammon, earth and heaven, into one and the same pursuit is impossible. We must be decided on one side or the other. And if there be not about us a willingness to deny our own lusts and appetites, control our tempers, and submit all our life to God's perfect and holy law—if there be not stamped, not outwardly on our dress, but inwardly on the life, the sign of the cross, never shall we wear the crown. And, lastly, can we say with the apostle, "God forbid that we should glory?" Brethren, bring the question personally to yourselves. Identify your own state, your own feelings, your own prospects with it. Do you glory in the cross of Christ? What will it avail us that others accept, if we refuse? What will it avail us that ten thousand times ten thousand saints pass into heaven, if we are shut out at last? God give us grace to bring home closely to our own hearts these truths, that we may all exclaim with the apostle, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world." Amen!

STRAITS OF MESSINA.

By REV. WM. CARTER, D.D.

Our Special Correspondent

"ONE touch of pity makes the whole world kin." News of the terrible destruction in Sicily and Calabria had no sooner been flashed throughout the world than from North and South, East and West, sympathy not only began to pour in, but substantial aid in money, food, clothing and general supplies. America, England, France, Germany, Russia, and even the isles of the sea began to vie with each other, and with heroic Italy itself, in their efforts to succor, comfort and help the outcast people who had suffered so cruelly at the hands of old Mother Earth.

In this work of general relief let us not forget the part the Italians themselves played. No sooner had the word reached Rome of the destruction than the King, accompanied by Queen Helena, left at once for the scene of the disaster. The Queen at first was compelled to return to the boat as soon as she landed at Messina, so terrible was the sight; but the King went courageously among the ruins and with his own hands aided in the rescue of many of the wounded and dying. Everywhere he reassured and cheered survivors and rescuers alike. As he walked through the ruins of Reggio, to which he went after Messina, he cried out, weeping, "Anche Reggio e finita!" ("Reggio, too, is ended!") But the people cried—even those that were imprisoned and dying—"Abbiam il Rè! Abbiam tutto!" ("We have the King! We have everything!")

In the specific work of relief, the two things that have attracted the most attention have been the fitting out of the American relief boat Bayern and the immediate and munificent response of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the appeal for aid.

The Comte di Somalia, who is the vice-president of the Italian Red Cross Society, and with whom I had a long talk in Naples, expressed himself as profoundly moved by the sympathy and great liberality of the American people in this hour of Italy's great need.

"It will make me much pleasure," he said in his idiomatic English, "if you will say for me and my people how deeply do we appreciate what the Americans have done, and especially your New York CHRISTIAN HERALD."

From him I learned how the funds were being administered. There is a central committee in Rome that has charge of the distribution, and the Comte di Somalia is field officer for the committee. Relief stations have been opened in all the stricken cities, and in Catania, Syracuse and Naples. They have put into the field 10 field hospitals of 50 beds each, 200 big tents for unwounded refugees, accommodating 50 persons each; 11 ambulances, two hospital trains, one hospital boat, 180 doctors, 500 male nurses and 100 women nurses. Prussia, Germany, England, France and America also sent their special detachments, working independently, but of course in consultation with the Italian Red Cross.

In addition there are hundreds working among the refugees at Catania, Syracuse, Naples and elsewhere. In Naples, the Count told me, he thought there were fully 10,000 refugees, and 2,000 or more of these were in the hospitals, sick and wounded. Catania is one great hospital, not only the public buildings but private houses also being utilized. So is Taormina, so is Syracuse, so is every coast town.

How nobly people are working I know from many interviews. "Were you hurt in the earthquake?" I asked a peasant at Messina, both of whose hands and arms were swathed to the elbow in bandages. "Oh, no!" he said; "I escaped all right." "How was this done, then?" I asked, pointing to his bandaged arms. "Oh, I did that," he said, "in helping others."

In Naples I met two English girls, young modest, retiring, helpless things it would seem from appearances, but they had both been to the front, had tramped into the interior for twenty miles over debris, to carry first aid to the injured and supplies for the needy. "How did you get along for quarters?" I asked. "Oh, we had to camp out in the open, like the rest of the people," they said. "And food?" I said. "Nothing but the tinned things we took with us," they responded. And these, remember, were not Red Cross nurses, but two young English women of culture and refinement, who had been wintering on the Riviera when the catastrophe happened and offered their services to the Red Cross expedition.

In Naples also I met an English shipping merchant, who has a beautiful home in the suburbs, which he at once opened to the refugees. He had two daughters, who had never been inside of a hospital, yet they both offered themselves to one of the hospitals as special helpers, and while I was going through the wards with their father I saw one of them called by a doctor to aid in a dressing while the other was washing the blood and dirt from the face of one of the sufferers. At the same time such awful cries of agony were coming from one of the "first aid" rooms nearby as to make the father say to me, strong man that he was, "Come along, I can't stand this!"

Of the work of the American relief ship Bayern there can be nothing but praise. Mr. Griscom, the American Ambassador; Captain Belknap, American naval attaché, and Major Landis, military attaché, were untiring in their endeavors to aid the sufferers and make the expedition a success. With the boat there were three Italian doctors and twenty nurses, three of them American young ladies—Miss Laurence, Miss Nelson and Miss Moir. The cargo they took down was largely general supplies, which was very acceptable, but they found the pressing need was for lumber to build temporary huts for the people, so the boat is about to return to Naples for a cargo of lumber, which it will distribute throughout the stricken territory. The Comte di Somalia indeed told me that the great need now was for lumber, clothing and shoes.

Survivors Tenting Out at Reggio

Landing at the "Immacolatella Nuova," at Naples, I saw great crowds of refugees just in from Messina, Reggio and the other stricken places, sitting disconsolately on heaps of dirty bed-clothing and blankets. Mothers were there with babies crying in their arms, the fathers of whom lay mangled under tons of debris in what had once been their homes. Strong, salwart men were there, so pitifully helpless and forlorn because the woman's hand was missing and the woman's presence gone that had cheered and comforted them in their other times of trial. The wounded and the dying were there, looking so wan, so wretched, so ghastly in the early morning light.

In Naples private homes, and those among the poorest as well as the richest, are entertaining refugees. The hotel keepers have hired a public building and are caring for 500 of them free of charge. The municipalities in other places have asked for refugees to be quartered on them, and the Red Cross Committees are sending out hundreds and thousands all over Italy to be cared for by those who have asked the privilege.

In the Hospital "Incurabile" I met the Duc d'Ascoli walking the wards stopping to talk with a victim here, to help a doctor with a dressing there, and to play with a little child yonder, whom the earthquake had left so pitifully and pitilessly alone. In the very ward where I met the Duke was a woman with a child only three months old, both of them saved, but her other six children lost. Another, a woman with a child two years old, was imprisoned with her baby eight days in the ruins, suffering all the pangs of hunger and thirst, together with the horror of impending death. Another, a young girl of eighteen, has gone deaf and dumb and mad with the awful experiences through which she has come.

Immediately opposite the landing place in Messina is the dogano, or custom house, now a mass of twisted iron, broken girders and a heap of stones. Along this same street that faces the harbor, called interchangeably the "Corso Vittorio Emanuele" and

Outside the Ruins of Their Homes

"La Palazzata," from the uniform row of palaces that line it, appears to be the worst zone of the earthquake's effect in Messina. It is on this street that the seaward front of the Palazzo del Municipio stands, also the Hotel Trinacria, where not a soul escaped, and the American Consulate, where Consul Cheney and his wife lost their lives. Here the full force of the earthquake did its deadly work. Here, for some reason, the earth seems to have least resistance, for in the great earthquake of 1783, that overthrew much the same territory as now—Palmi, Reggio and Messina having to be entirely rebuilt—this street then felt the shock the worst, and in consequence the palaces, as they were restored along the harbor front, were only built two stories high.

Along this street I walked, taking pictures as I went and talking with the people as I could. "I had a store here," said one man, pointing to a heap of ruins; "now everything is gone." "I had two friends living there," said another, as he indicated a pile of debris, "but both are lost, and we have not found their bodies yet."

My objective point, however, was the American Consulate, where for nineteen days efforts had been made to find the bodies of the Consul and his ill-fated wife, but all without avail. A little way farther along the Corso, I saw 200 or more American sailors digging in the ruins that marked the site of the former United States Consulate. They had been working there since early morning and nothing had yet been found. Vice-Consul S. K. Lupton was directing affairs and the strain on his face and the circles under his eyes told of the pressure under which he had been laboring for almost three weeks. "No, we have not found them yet," he said to me, "but I think we will this afternoon. I do hope so," he added, "for Cheney," and there was a catch in his voice as he said it, "was a very dear friend to me."

After lunch the men returned to their tasks with a will, and, as the vice-consul hoped, they found the bodies about two o'clock, while I waited and did what I could. It was a sad, sad sight, and never will I forget it as they lifted the bruised, broken and mangled bodies of the dead consul and his wife from their temporary grave. Death had apparently been instantaneous. There was no struggle manifest, no contortion. The only thing that indicated any consciousness was the sheet convulsively grasped in the consul's hand, that had to be pried open to release it. It was apparently a first convulsive horror, and then a merciful death that must have followed instantaneously.

Tenderly they were both lifted out and placed on stretchers near at hand, then carried down the heap of ruins to the ground below, where two caskets were awaiting them, and there the soldiers gently placed them, sealed the inner leaden case, screwed down the cover of the outer one and bore them to the boat that was to carry them to their last resting place. As I took pictures of the melancholy scene, at the express wish of those concerned, Vice-Consul Lupton said to me, with a break in his voice: "You'll send me a picture, won't you? I would like to have some last memento of dear old Cheney." And pressing his hand, I promised, as he hurried with the bodies to the boat.

Shall I tell of more of the horrors of this terrible day? Of the bodies I found protruding from the ruins? Of the indescribable stench that arose from the human putrefaction all about me? It is a sad and awful story, and I will be brief, as becomes any necessary mention of such horriblbe details.

Here in this same building that housed the Consulate I found the body of a woman huddled on a mattress in such dreadful contortions as made her occupy less than half the normal length of her body. In another place a human arm was sticking out and a half-starved dog crouched beside it, and could not be moved. Across the street were the bodies of a man and his wife, the woman with her hands in her hair, the husband with his arm about his wife's neck as though trying to comfort her. A block away they took out three children alive, the nineteenth day after the disaster. They had been imprisoned in a basement that had only partly fallen in, and where dried figs, onions and wine were stored. Two of them are girls, sixteen and thirteen years of age, and one a boy of eleven.

It was night as I left Messina. I was anxious to see Reggio, Palmi, Melito and the rest of the coast, and so I had to go. The captain of our vessel told me that so violent was the upheaval in the straits themselves that places which were before 700 metres and more in depth are now only 100 metres or less. Certain it is that the coast line has been materially changed, and, from the soundings, the conformation of the ocean bed also.

As we near Palmi we see three Italian war vessels lying at anchor in the harbor and distributing supplies as well as rescuing the sufferers. The ruins do not look as bad here as at Messina; but what a sight it is after all! Buildings here and there mere dust heaps. Homes with front walls torn away, showing us the wreckage within. Part of the wall fallen across the place where once the bed had been; floors here and there carried down with the weight of wreckage to the cellar below, and, as though to mock us with our impotence even in our strength, fragile pictures still hanging uninjured upon the standing walls, egg-shell china and brittle glasses standing unbroken on the sideboards, while man, in his pride and strength, lies bruised, bleeding and broken in the ruins below. Of a little over 10,000 inhabitants 4,500 lie under those piled up heaps of ruins.

In that little town, 3,700 victims were carried down to death in a moment. It was here and at Scylla and Messina that the tidal wave did its worst, and San Giovanni, like Scylla, presents mostly a barren shore line, where before you found busy wharves and quays.

Over on the Sicilian side, Gazzi is the first stop, and just below it Contessa. Both were quite small places and only a little over 500 were lost between them, but the ruin is just as complete in the small places as in the large, and the death list just as great in proportion.

As we draw near to Reggio, we see a sight even more appalling to the eye than Messina, at first glance. Out of 35,000 people, 31,000 were lost. Yet, strange to say, Reggio is to-day more habitable than Messina. We see some shops open and doing business still; in Messina, not a single shop is open save those opened in the streets, on rough boards, for the distribution of supplies. Here some people can still live in parts of their homes.

Just a little south of Reggio lies Pellaro, on the coast. Pellaro was small, just a distant suburb indeed of Reggio, seven miles away, but notwithstanding its smallness 3,300 dead lie in the ruins of that once thriving place. Here is a line of ruins facing the sea that covers about as much as an American block and only one chimney standing, like a slender tower, among the debris. There is a house with the end all torn away, the roof fallen in and carrying with it three floors with their human freight, and the pictures mocking us with their very frailty, yet safe, as they hang untouched upon the tottering walls.

So is it all down the coast as far as Melito. Seismographic waves are not stopped by curves or angles. Like an express train rounding a turn at lightning speed, the earthquake wave rounded the southern extremity of Italy, struck Melito a deadly blow and left 2,300 dead and lying in its wake.

But why follow it further? The sights and scenes witnessed are enough for a lifetime. Calabria, for 86 miles, or from Palmi on the west coast to Marina Gerace on the east coast, is one long line of ruins, with 50 towns or more overthrown, while innumerable villages and hamlets in the mountains in between have been partially or totally destroyed. On the east coast of Sicily, from Messina to Nizza, a distance of seventeen miles, a score of towns lie in dust heaps, while off the coast and in the mountains dozens of others are gradually sending in their lists of dead.

Yes, it is truly awful, it is horrible; but God is good, and Christian sympathy is not wanting; and soon we shall see smiling fields amid these scenes of desolation, and thriving cities, plying again their thousand wheels of trade; for Messina, Reggio, Palmi and all the rest of these coast towns, notwithstanding all that has been said, will build again, as they did after the earthquake of 1783, and work out their lives, even in the shadow of impending death.

For a Loyal Christian Church

THERE are many indications that the time is near at hand when the Christian Church and the leaders of the faith must arouse themselves to the need of upholding a true and faithful Gospel ministry in every Christian pulpit. It will be a testing-time, for the line will have to be drawn between a loyal ministry, preaching a whole-hearted Gospel of faith and consecration, such as Jesus himself preached, and a ministry which substitutes a nondescript philosophy, calculated to undermine faith, to eliminate the essentials of the Gospel and to lead its victims out into the bleak wilderness of doubt and confusion.

This coming battle between loyal Christianity and masked infidelity will have to be fought out in many a pulpit and many a pew. It may take years of conflict. But no matter how short or long the struggle, it will result, as all similar conflicts have resulted, in a triumph for the old Gospel.

In scattered pulpits here and there, and in not a few theological schools, it has become the fashion to flout the old Bible. Some preachers and professors have tried to prove how much superior is their understanding of spiritual things to that of the prophets, the evangelists and the great leaders of the faith, who lived close to Christ and followed in his footsteps. But souls are not saved by belittling the Scriptures, nor are hearts won from sin to righteousness by undermining the faith of the simple. It would be a charitable conclusion to think that such attacks ordinarily proceed from intellectual vanity or sheer love of sensation. This is doubtless true of a majority of the shallow and superficial assaults on the old Bible and the religion of Jesus Christ. It is surprising how few of the great thinkers and eminent scholars are to be found in the ranks of infidelity. But it is not the open and avowed infidel who is the most dangerous foe of the Christian faith. It is the veiled infidel, the agnostic, the man who subtly slurs inspiration and miracles, who questions Biblical authority and authenticity, who reads into the old Book new and doubtful meanings, who is full of smart suggestions concerning passages that are apparently contradictory, but which have been long ago cleared up satisfactorily by able and reverent scholarship. "These half-infidels in our orthodox pulpits," says a recent writer in The Bible Student and Teacher, "are as hostile to true Christianity and more pernicious to Christian faith than open infidels."

True and loyal in the Master's service, the great body of the Christian ministry will not shrink from the struggle with those who are trying to break down the old faith. They will be ready when it comes.

Mr. Taft and the Canal

PRESIDENT-ELECT TAFT has done the country a service in going to Panama. He has personally inspected the work in the canal zone and has been convinced of its thoroughness and of the safety and effectiveness of the engineers' plans. These American engineers, he is reported to have said in a speech delivered before starting home, know what they are about. "The American people," he declares emphatically, "will build the canal," and ships will be passing through it before 1915! He uses some pretty plain language in characterizing the "reports and criticisms by irresponsible persons" to the contrary.

Making every allowance for optimism, Mr. Taft is justified in taking an encouraging view of the situation. Our Panama project will be costly; but when the canal is finished it will be one of the world's greatest commercial highways. We adopt his view in preference to that of the prophets of failure, who have been so industrious in their gloomy predictions lately. There are no difficulties in the way at Panama that cannot be overcome by the skill and determination which are characteristic of the American people.

California and the Japanese

BY a decisive vote, the lower house of the California Legislature has rejected the Drew bill, excluding aliens from becoming land-owners. This measure was drawn especially to shut out the Japanese. Later, the Assembly passed the Johnson bill, compelling the Japanese in California to attend separate public schools. This school segregation bill, if permitted to become a law, would probably revive the agitation in acute form and undo all that has been accomplished by our government and by the friends of moderation in California. Apart from the question as to its constitutionality, which would have to be tested in the courts, there is a likelihood of the bill being defeated in the Senate.

We believe that sober second thought will convince our California friends of the wisdom of taking no further step that will disturb our amicable relations with a friendly power, or complicate those relations at the present time, when there is an excellent prospect that the whole question which now vexes California, Utah, Nevada, and certain other sections of the West, will be satisfactorily settled. Patriotism and common sense are both against anti-Japanese legislation, at a time when it could produce no other result than embarrassment to the federal government in its present negotiations. We should not disregard the recent declaration of the Japanese government, expressed through its Premier and its Minister of Foreign Affairs, that it desires to meet the wishes of our government and is "energetically discouraging emigration to the United States." Japan is striving to turn the tide of its surplus population toward Korea and Manchuria, and the side drift has already begun and will doubtless increase in volume. Assuming good faith on Japan's part, the reasonable prospect is that the problem which now vexes California, Nevada, and a few other sections will soon settle itself.

Two Pictures of Washington

IN this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are given two pictures, copied from famous paintings, illustrating two events in the life of Washington, the anniversary of whose birth never fails to quicken the patriotic impulse and revive the national conscience. The first picture, on the cover page, of "Washington Bidding Farewell to His Mother," shows at a glance one reason why the man chosen by destiny to become the military and civil leader of the American Colonies was so successful. There was always a strong bond of affection between Washington and his mother. She was a woman of strong character and of high ideals. No one can study the earlier years of Washington without realizing what an influence his mother exerted both then and on his after life. She wished him to be a brave, upright, manly man, whether he ever became great and famous or not. Fame and high place she regarded as decidedly secondary.

As often as possible during the Revolutionary period he went to see her, and to her he always was George the son, not Washington the leader of victorious armies. Indeed, we are told that, after the independence of the country was assured, he visited her in her quiet Virginian home and they talked of family affairs. She never spoke of his career as a general, but inquired anxiously after his health and spoke anxiously of the dangers and hardships to which he had been exposed. Yet, when he stooped to kiss her farewell, we cannot but think that her heart thrilled with motherly pride that it was her son who had served so well his country in his country's need. Later she attended, as guest of honor, a reception at which the officers of the French and American armies were present. Stately and dignified, she received the homage of brave men, who saw in the son in part the image of the mother. It is a fact that too little attention has been paid to the memory of the mother of Washington in our February celebration of the hero's birth. As we owe much to him who was first in war and first in peace, so we owe much to the woman who moulded his life so that he was fitted for the great task of nation-making when the time came.

The second picture, "Washington's Reception by the People of New York a Week Before His Inauguration," is from a famous painting noteworthy for its historical accuracy. Washington's journey from Mount Vernon to New York was a triumphal progress, and his reception at the latter place would have been enough to turn the head of a less wise man. Ladies and gentlemen, in decorated barges, met him, singing odes of welcome; boat after boat, with banners, joined the water procession; ships manned their yards, and the guns of the Spanish and other ships boomed their salutes. "Our worthy President," says a contemporary account, "was greatly affected by these tokens of profound respect." When he reached the ferry landing, the stairs were found to be covered with carpet and draped with crimson, and on the steps were flower-girls and veterans of the army. No pains were spared to make the event one to be remembered by all who saw it and to be handed by tradition to their children's children. The original painting, a fine work of art, is in the possession of Mr. T. T. Fryer, of New York City, who kindly gave the permission to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for its reproduction. Several printings were required to give the beautiful result shown.

The Pilgrim and the Bridge

A MAN stood upon a height, overlooking an estuary of the sea. On the opposite shore was a bold headland. Wishing to cross thither, he cast about to find a way, but the abyss of water lay between. Then One who stood beside him said: "The bridge is safe; advance and fear not." "But I see no bridge," said the traveler. "Take this glass and look," said the One who stood at his side. And the man took it and looked, and lo! a bridge was spanning the great gulf of waters. Yet he saw but a small part of that end which was nearest. He went forward courageously, and, as he advanced, the bridge stretched out before him, though the farther end was still obscured. He marveled much at this wonder, and inquired the reason. "This glass," explained the One who had led him to look, "is Faith; it gives spiritual vision and reveals that which is hid from the eye of flesh." Advancing more confidently, he saw the bridge now more clearly, as its proportions were gradually disclosed. And he went on his way across, singing and rejoicing, for he was glad at heart.

THE INAUGURAL PROCESSION ARRIVING IN FRONT OF PRESIDENT GOMEZ'S PALACE, HAVANA

Gomez, President of Cuba

JOSE MIGUEL GOMEZ was inaugurated President of the restored Cuban republic on January 28. Inauguration Day in Havana was brilliant with sunshine and decorations. Early in the morning, crowds began to gather in front of the Palace. All the ships in the harbor, including the American battleships, put on gay attire. When Governor Magoon and the President-elect arrived from the latter's residence the reception hall of the Palace was crowded to its capacity with brilliantly uniformed diplomatic representatives and army officers, black-gowned Justices of the Supreme Court and conventionally attired civilians. At noon, the newly elected President stepped out on the Palace balcony, on the second floor, accompanied by the Provisional Governor and the Supreme Court Judges. The crowd cheered him heartily and then was silent, as the Chief Justice read the oath of office and General Gomez pledged himself faithfully to uphold and defend the laws and the Constitution. After a brief address, he returned into the Palace, where Governor Magoon read his final decree and the commission from Washington, authorizing him to turn over to the republic of Cuba the administration of the government of the island. After reading this letter, addressed to the President and Congress of the new republic, Governor Magoon handed it to President Gomez, saying he did so under the direction of the President of the United States.

President Gomez, in accepting the letter from Governor Magoon, read his reply in Spanish, saying:

We receive from you the government of Cuba, which you turn over to us in compliance with the instructions of the President of the United States. We have heard your statement, and take note of the document which you deliver to us. All acquired rights shall be respected in harmony with the principles of international law, the principles of our Constitution, and the provisions of the appendix of the Constitution. The Constitution shall be upheld in all its integrity, because our chief concern will be to preserve it inviolate. We shall faithfully adhere to the treaty between the United States and Cuba, as this is our duty while the same remains in force, and we shall endeavor through good government and vigilant administration to obviate that at any time it shall be found necessary to apply any of its clauses. The United States will always find a friendly nation in Cuba.

We are indebted to your nation for its generous aid in the maintenance of our institutions, and the cordial relations existing will never grow less through any act of ours. Once again, we are masters of our fate, and there is not a Cuban heart but swears to maintain for all time the newly acquired integrity of the nation, and who does not at the same time feel the profoundest gratitude toward those who, after governing them, have faithfully performed their agreement and now leave us in the full enjoyment of our sovereignty.

The United States government has been true to its traditions and to the highest moral ideas in helping struggling Cuba and preventing its liberal form of government from falling into helpless anarchy. The people of Cuba made rather poor use of their newly-found liberties at the start; but the wisdom and strength of the American government came to their rescue, and now the Cuban people, through the new President whom they have elected, give to us and the world the assurance that they prize their freedom and will maintain a republican form of government. With nations, as with men, the duty of the strong to help the weak is imperative.

We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak. (Rom. 15 : 1.)

The Cucumber-Orange

By a telegram from Gardner, Mass., it is learned that a New England man has just produced a vegetable which is a cross between a cucumber and an orange. The new cucumber, fine-grained, delicious in taste, of a perfect yellow color, was produced in crossing the blossom of a cucumber and an orange. The gentleman who produced this kind of fruit said:

I had an orange and a cucumber one day, and, without thought, mixed together some of the pulp of the two. The product was mostly cucumber, but the orange gave it a most delectable flavor. Instantly the idea came to mind to blend the two into one growth, and I began my experiments. The first year, the products of my cucumber vine changed slightly in color. The second year they took on the almost round shape of the orange. The third year the cucumber took the perfect round shape, the spines or little prickles dropped off, and the cucumber had the unmistakable orange flavor. I picked the cucumber-orange ten weeks after planting. From a single vine I had five perfect ones. On the inside of it, nearest the skin, it is mostly orange, and has the little cells similar to that fruit. The centre of it is the same as that of a cucumber, but the seeds are not like those of either an orange or a cucumber. At the end of three years, I have sixty seeds for next year's crop, from which I expect to get a large harvest.

The science of flower and fruit culture has gotten to be little short of the marvelous. God gave man dominion over the earth, and man is becoming more and more a wise and efficient gardener.

And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat. (Gen. 1:29.)

Triumphal Arch Through which the Procession Marched

No Tramps Allowed

Switzerland is a poor place for tramps. Its geographical characteristics are not very friendly to their kind of recreations, and the government is a worse barrier to their feet than the high mountains. The man out of employment who does not make an honest effort to find work is not tolerated for a moment in that country. The district authorities will put him at hard work and small pay, or send him to the workhouse as an alternative. These workhouses are under military rule. The work is severe, and the wages only a penny or two a day, and it is as hard to get out of them as it is easy to get into them. The State systematicly bends its energy to find steady employment, at reasonable wages, for men who are honest and willing to work.

Our own country could copy the example of Switzerland to advantage in dealing with the tramp question. Human society does itself a harm to carry, as a dead weight, the men of able bodies who will not work, but "beat" their way from day to day and from place to place in idleness. And the industrial problem has gotten to be so complex and acute that society must pay more attention to securing systematic employment for men who are honest and competent and willing to work. It is a higher form of charity to teach men to carry themselves and their families, rather than to carry them. Labor is one of God's laws, which it is well for individuals and for society to obey.

Six days thou shalt labor, and do all thy work. (Deut. 5 : 13.)

Buddhism and Christianity

A few Sundays ago, a Buddhist church was dedicated in Santa Cruz, Calif. Shortly before the dedication, one of the city papers contained an animated discussion by correspondents as to the comparative merits of Christianity and Buddhism. The Very Rev. Svami Mazzinianda, in his letter favoring Buddhism, included a criticism upon an article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, on tearing down a Buddhist temple in Philadelphia. He insisted that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was mistaken in the claim that Christianity was supplanting Buddhism. In his communication he produced statistics claiming that there were 327,000,000 of Christians in the world, while the Buddhists have 560,000,000 adherents. His figures were the exaggerations of an Oriental imagination. From estimates by M. Fournier de Flaix, which are the latest that have been made by a competent authority, we learn that Buddhism has but 147,900,000 followers and that Christianity has a total of 477,080,158.

The Buddhist priest, after his criticism upon his misrepresentations of Christianity, which he claims to be Christianity, maintains that the cardinal belief of his religion is a change of heart. Buddhism, it is true, teaches a change of heart, but it also holds that a man changes his own heart. Christianity teaches the necessity of a change of heart, and also the cardinal fact that God must change the heart. All other religions hold that man saves himself—Christianity teaches that God saves him. And because the Christian doctrine of divine regeneration by faith in Christ is true, all other religions will give way and the true one will become universal.

He shall speak peace unto the heathen: and his domination shall be from sea even to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth. (Zech. 9:10.)

PROMINENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are well acquainted with the work of Rev. William Wilkinson, of Minneapolis, Minn., who, for the last few years, has conducted during part of the year open-air preaching services in the financial district of New York City and has been often called "the Bishop of Wall Street." Mr. Wilkinson's efforts have been crowned with success and he never fails of a thoughtful and appreciative audience whenever he appears for his daily service. Such an impression has been made by his pioneer evangelistic work in lower New York that Trinity Church has called him to head a new evangelical department of the parish. It will include not only the regular Wall Street preaching, but a chapel will be placed under his charge and an active campaign be carried on to reach the thousands in the lower part of the city who at present have been neglected by the churches, or who themselves have neglected what church privileges have been offered them. Mr. Wilkinson stipulated in his agreement with Trinity that he should have an absolutely free hand in his new field.

St. John's Chapel, for the retention of which as a centre of Christian activities such an effort has been recently made, will probably be used as a day mission. In addition, an active work will be carried on along the water front, in the warehouses and factories, and in streets and in other missions.

"I am to popularize the work," said Mr. Wilkinson, in an interview.

"There are 400,000 men in Manhattan Island below Houston Street during the day. There are 3,700 ships arriving every month at the docks. In the government employ alone there are 3,000 in this city. This great mass of humanity must be ministered to, and I am going to try and do it."

Mr. Wilkinson has been in Minneapolis for twenty-five years, and his many friends there are trying their best to have him remain among them. He is one of the most popular clergymen among all classes in the State. Despite the strong efforts made to retain him, it is probable that he will enter on his new field some time in May. What is Minneapolis' loss is certainly New York's gain, and Trinity parish is to be congratulated on securing Mr. Wilkinson for its new department of evangelical work. No other man, by training and natural aptitude, is so well fitted for the position.

SELAH MERRILL, D.D., LL.D., eminent as author, archæologist and diplomat, and for many years United States Consul at Jerusalem, passed away at the home of his sister, Mrs. Henry Wetherbee, in Fruitvale, Calif., on January 22.

Dr. Merrill a few years ago was transferred from Jerusalem to British Guiana, and later to a similar post in Germany. Owing to ill health, he abandoned the trip to the latter place and returned to Fruitvale with his wife.

He was born in Connecticut in 1837, and graduated from Williston Academy, Yale University and the Yale Divinity School. He later served as chaplain in the Civil War. As a member of the American Geological Commission he was sent by the United States government to Palestine and did much valuable archæological work there. He contributed copiously to Palestinian archæology. His best known books are Galilee in the Time of Christ, East of the Jordan and his recently finished splendid volume, Ancient Jerusalem. He has also contributed many articles relative to the land in which he lived and worked, to current magazines.

Dr. Merrill was a frequent contributor to the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and many of his articles treating of Palestine and its people have appeared in these pages during the last twenty years, illustrated by photographs taken with his own camera. His long experience among the people of the Orient, his ripe scholarship and his rare literary skill were all employed to the best advantage in these remarkable articles, which illuminated every topic they touched and made him one of our most valued contributors.

Dr. Merrill had suffered for several years from a throat affection, contracted in the East, the result of a trying climate. His general health broke down under the severe strain, and when, in the latter part of January, he suffered a stroke of paralysis, his weakened condition held out no hopes of recovery.

WHILE the number of men who rise from the ranks in the army of industry is apparently much less than some years ago, there occur now and then a striking instance to show that it is still possible. Mr. William C. Brown, of the New York Central Railroad, is a case in point. Forty years ago he was a section-hand on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad, where he endured all of the hardships and the many dangers of the men who work along the tracks. He took every opportunity to learn, had the determination to rise higher, and, a few years later, he was a telegraph operator, working as train dispatcher, for the Rock Island, the Burlington and the Illinois Central. This position was merely another stepping stone. Nothing in the line of railroading was too little or too big to escape his notice. He passed from one position to another because he was one of the men who knew how things were done and was on the lookout for some way to do things better. In 1896 he became general manager of the entire Burlington system. He held this important post for five years, and then he was elected vice-president and general manager of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern. Railroad men in the East had been watching his development as a railroad executive, and he was offered the vice-presidency of the New York Central. W. H. Newman has just resigned as president and has been succeeded by Mr. Brown as head of this and allied roads. In his profession he can go no higher; the position is the highest this branch of the world's work can give. Such a man at the head of affairs, acquainted with every department of the business, from actual work, has the respect of every man under him, and he is also an incentive to others, showing the possibilities open to the man on the lower rungs of the ladder.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—EVANGELIST JOHN A. DAVIS has just completed a five weeks' series of success meetings at Latrobe, Pa. Great spiritual results are reported.

—THE TWELFTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS on Alcoholism will meet in London, July 18 to 24. There will be many eminent speakers from different countries.

—REV. JOHN NORBERRY has just closed a series of meetings of seven weeks and eight Sundays, in the John Wesley Pentecostal Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. About 300 seekers came to the altar.

—TENNESSEE TEMPERANCE reformers are greatly elated over the refusal of the Legislature to sustain the Governor's veto on the Holladay Prohibition bill. The vote in the Senate was 20 to 13 and in the House 61 to 36.

—MISS MARIE JANSZ, of Haarlem, Holland, has charge of the Industrial Mission at Pangoengsen, Java, caring for from 150 to 300 Javanese. The work is making rapid spiritual progress and has taken a firm hold upon the hearts of the people.

—AT MULVANE, KAN., a union meeting of Presbyterians, United Brethren and Methodists has just closed. It was the greatest meeting in the town's history. Over 200 confessed Christ. Evangelists Hay Bell, of Carbondale, Ill., and H. M. Fisher, of Patoka, Ind., conducted the services.

—SCRANTON, PA., is being shaken by a revival. Sinners are being led to Christ by scores and hundreds daily. A tabernacle holding 4,000 people was constructed for holding the meetings during January. Rev. R. A. Torrey, with a corps of assistants, is conducting the meetings. A choir of 400 voices is led by Dr. G. L. Palmer, of Toronto, Canada.

—THERE IS AN EXCELLENT opportunity for missionary work among the Italians, Poles, and other foreigners, many hundreds of whom are now employed in the refineries at Linden, N. J. R. H. Crawford (formerly a missionary among the Hindus and Kafirs in South Africa) will distribute Gospels, or any good literature, among these people. He may be addressed: General Delivery, Elizabeth, N. J.

—BERNE, NORTHERN INDIANA, has recently experienced a remarkable religious awakening. The meetings began December 27, under the leadership of Rev. and Mrs. M. S. Rees, of Rochester, N. Y. All the churches took part in the work. Many conversions are reported. Hundreds expressed their determination to follow Christ more earnestly. Not less than 250 people confessed Christ during the meetings.

—THE KANSAS FORWARD MOVEMENT for Evangelistic Work, with Dr. W. E. Biederwolf at its head, is now in the fourth month of its campaign. Over a hundred towns and cities have held revivals, and many more are making active preparations. Nearly all the meetings are union, and are usually carried on in specially constructed tabernacles. Evangelist Biederwolf has just closed a meeting at Independence, where a tabernacle holding 3,000 was crowded nearly every night, and 800 people accepted Christ.

—DR. LEVI B. SALMANS, of The Good Samaritan Hospital, Guanajuato, Mexico, writes: "People who came here from outside towns, and stayed in the midst of our praying band for a month or so, have gone to their homes convinced that the Gospel is the way of salvation. One told me a week ago that he was now anathematized by the priest of his town, and was hardly able to find workmen for his quarry because he had changed his religious ways. He asked me to pray for him, that his faith might not fail under the persecutions he was suffering in his home town."

—THE GERMAN EMPEROR recently paid a pleasing compliment to the American Church in Berlin, on his birthday anniversary, by presenting it with an English edition of Professor von Baumgart's illustrated work on Wartburg, the castle at Eisenach immortalized in Wagner's "Tannhæuser," and famous as the abode of Martin Luther. The work, which is a masterpiece of German engraving and printing, is the duplicate of the book the Kaiser presented to the Bodleian Library at Oxford in 1907. He dispatched the book to the residence of the Rev. Dr. James F. Dickie, the former pastor of the church, with the request that it be placed in the library as evidence of his interest in the church's welfare.

—A NEW YORK Times correspondent in Messina tells a remarkable incident. A new infidel publication, in its first issue, attacked the church and religion generally, and in a single blasphemous sentence asserted that "there is no God" and challenged the Deity to prove his existence by sending an earthquake! This incident was recalled by many with horror after the earthquake, which occurred next day. It is said to have made a great impression upon the Southern Italians. "That editor," adds the correspondent, "will have been the best missionary the church has had for many a year."

—A MISSIONARY EXCHANGE gives this bright little bit of helpful sentiment which may cheer some tired worker:

If any little word of mine
May make a life the brighter,
If any little song of mine
May make a heart the lighter,
God help me speak the little word
And take my bit of singing,
And drop it in some lonely vale
To set the echoes ringing.

ILLUSTRATED RED LINE EDITION PILGRIM'S PROGRESS

WE have on hand a limited number of copies of our superb Illustrated Red Line Edition of Pilgrim's Progress, by John Bunyan, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD issued as a special De Luxe Edition some time ago, and which is unquestionably one of the finest and most attractive presentations of this supreme masterpiece ever put before the American people.

These books are not shelf-worn, and are guaranteed to be undamaged in any way, but to make room for other publications we now offer them to our readers, at a decided financial sacrifice, for 60 cents per volume.

Pilgrim's Progress is the most beautiful allegory of human life ever written. It warms the heart, elevates the mind, dispels weariness and gloom and exerts its irresistible influence for good over rich and poor alike. An immortal book, and a book of truly immeasurable and imperishable power, this triumphant work appeals, as few books ever have or will, to the most intellectual as well as to the "plain" people; is relished as keenly by the aged as by the young; is a source of good cheer, and a lasting inspiration to men and women in every walk of life.

Though the Pilgrim's Progress is a book that should form an important part in the education of every child, and in most homes one that stands next to the Bible, there are still those who have never read its illuminating pages. But there are many more who have worn their treasured copies threadbare with long use. Here, then, is a big opportunity for any of our readers, who will write us at once, to secure at almost half price a volume that appeals to the eye as well as to the mind, that is good to look at as well as to read.

This edition is superb in its pictorial features, containing in all 102 fine illustrations—many of them full pages. The volume is handsomely bound in Red Vellum De Luxe, with an emblematic cover design and lettering in gold—428 pages. The book measures, when open, 9 x 15 inches, weighs nearly three pounds, and will be sent, all charges prepaid, upon receipt of 60 cents. Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Book Department, 92 Bible House, N. Y.

A TOWN SPIRITUALLY TRANSFORMED

MADISON, S. Dak., a pretty little prairie city of lovely homes and beautiful churches, the seat of Lake County, a rich agricultural section, has been the scene of an unusual religious awakening. Evangelist Robert E. Johnson, of Chicago, with a corps of workers, together with the federation of all the Protestant churches of the city, conducted the campaign, which is claimed to have resulted in over eight hundred conversions.

Early in November, cottage prayer meetings were held, and a large new tabernacle was erected, with a seating capacity of over 1,500. A marked spiritual change followed the meetings. Men talked religion on the street corners; delivery boys read their Bibles in their carts and wagons; barbers and shopkeepers might be seen with their Bibles open studying. The men's prayer meetings and the Sunday afternoon meetings were crowded. Drunkards and derelicts, the wanton and the profligate attended the meetings, and came "down the line" professing repentance and confessing their faith in Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of this revival was the large number of conversions among men and boys.

A popular movement to establish a Y. M. C. A. has taken definite form, and the subscription is already $7,000. New plans for social and civic betterment have been formed. Converts immediately united with the various churches; some 225 with the First Methodist, 100 with the Presbyterian, 75 with the Baptist and 150 with the Lutheran. Upon the departure of the evangelist and his workers there was a spectacular procession, from the tabernacle to the depot, of 1,500 persons, singing "Oh, What a Change!" and "The Fight Is On!"

A Revival Arouses Richmond

A REMARKABLE revival has lately stirred the city of Richmond, Va. It has swept hundreds into the kingdom and led many others to a higher plane of Christian living. Night after night crowds filled the City Auditorium to hear the evangelists, Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander. In other parts of the city thousands gathered at the district meetings. All evangelical denominations united in the revival movement. The Episcopalians entered heartily into it, an Episcopalian rector, Dr. Thomas Semmes, being chairman of the Evangelistic Committee. Several services were held in Episcopalian churches, Dr. Chapman and other speakers occupying the pulpits. Three revival meetings were held in St. Paul's Church, opposite the State Capitol, where Jefferson Davis and General Robert E. Lee once worshiped during the "sixties."

The central meetings were held in the City Auditorium, a big structure seating five thousand people. The building was formerly a market, but was remodeled for the Chapman - Alexander meetings, at a cost of $10,000, which was paid, not by the Mission Committee, but by the City Council. It is the first time on record where politicians have voted public money for revival meetings.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and Mr. Alexander, assisted by Robert Harkness, Ernest W. Naftzger and Ralph C. Norton, preached and sang in this Auditorium. Simultaneously, meetings were held in five churches in various districts of the city by the following evangelists and singers: Rev. Daniel S. Toy and Mr. Frank Dixon; Rev. Frank Granstaff and Mr. Owen F. Pugh; Rev. Thomas Needham and Mr. John W. Reynolds; Dr. Ora Samuel Gray and Mr. Charles F. Allen.

A revival luncheon was attended by about four hundred of the most representative men of Richmond. Hon. Claude A. Swanson, Governor of Virginia, was present, and warmly welcomed the evangelists to the capital of Virginia. He declared that he believed heart and soul in revivals, for he himself was converted at a revival of the old-fashioned Methodist kind. Continuing, the Governor said: "I know that it is the duty of every citizen, whether he is a member of the church or not, to carry into his life, into business, into politics, into the home circle, and into the church, the spirit of the Master whom he serves. True religion makes better citizens; it makes honest business men; it makes the work of governing easier; it makes the lives of the community purer, and, above all, it carries to each man's heart that divine and blessed doctrine that each man's soul is of eternal value. Kingdoms may come and go, governments rise and fall, laws fall into decay, the glory of this world pass away; but the soul of the individual stands separate and eternal, and it is on the appeal to each individual that religion ultimately depends."

The revival affected not only Richmond, but other parts of Virginia. People outside the city began to send in requests for prayer for the unsaved and the sick. One day, Dr. Chapman received a telegram from an anxious parent, whose boy was in Richmond. The telegram read: "Please pray for my boy, who is with you this evening." A minister wrote, saying he had been thoroughly discouraged and almost ready to give up, but that he had taken fresh courage through reading about the work of grace in Richmond.

The demand for New Testaments was so great that in three days 4,000 were sold. Hundreds of men joined the Pocket Testament League, agreeing to read a chapter of God's Word daily and to carry a New Testament or Bible with them wherever they went.

One evening, at a meeting, Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander announced they would present a copy of the New Testament to every fireman in the city. Persons in the audience said they would give a Testament to every policeman, to every street car conductor and to all the postmen in Richmond. Later others agreed to supply God's Word to the Street Cleaning Department. In this manner, between 1,000 and 1,500 New Testaments were distributed.

Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander, after ending their campaign at Richmond, began a movement in Boston, assisted by scores of evangelists, Gospel singers and special workers.

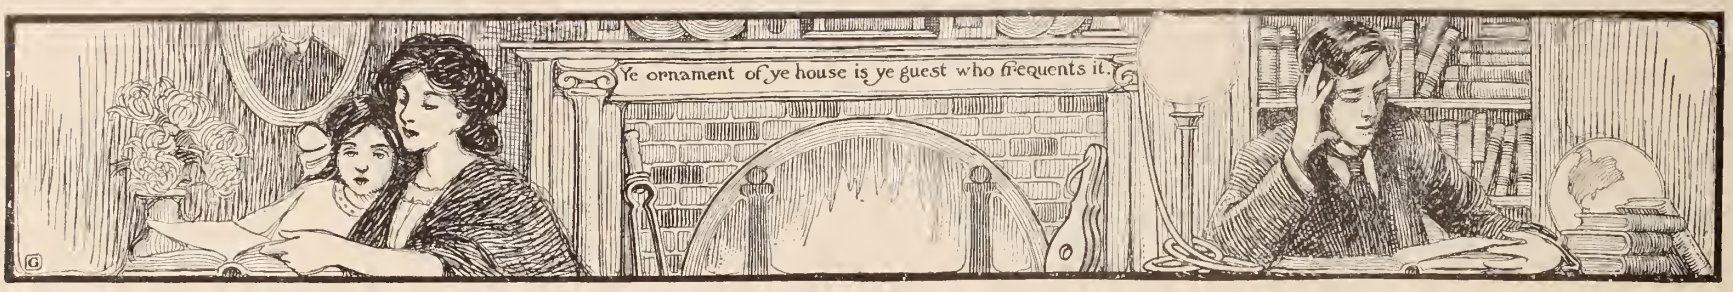
AROUND THE HOME HEARTH



An Ethical Marriage

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE newspaper press of New York published the other day the announcement of an ethical marriage. Precisely what was meant by this became a matter of discussion at the breakfast table, one member of the family insisting that marriage was in itself ethical, and another hazarding the suggestion that the ceremony might be conducted by the contracting parties themselves, in the presence of witnesses, without the intervention of a minister or magistrate. A careful reading of the paragraph presently showed that the newly-made husband and wife were persons of high character, engaged in social settlement work and devoting a large part of their lives to the service of their fellow-beings. Their wedding ceremony took place at the home of the bride's father, and was witnessed by relatives and friends, while the rite was performed by a friend of both bride and groom. A marriage license had been procured beforehand, in accordance with the law of the State. The ethical ceremony, however, omitted all mention of God, and included no prayer for the happy future of the two who were uniting their destinies for the earthly life. It was, in fact, wholly pagan, and the people concerned declared that they did not acknowledge a Divine Being by the fact that they ignored him at the most sacred moment in human experience. They claimed that they ruled their conduct on ethical principles only, and affirmed that they meant to be comrades true and tried in whatever lay before them. The groom, a physician and a writer on science, had no doubt arrived at materialistic conclusions that seemed satisfactory to himself. The bride, a girl of twenty-one, has been a teacher in a public school, and expects to continue her work after marriage as before. Her father, being questioned, stated that he was an atheist, and that his daughter, as far as he knew, had never heard the name of God, while religion, except as it signified the worship of nature, was unknown in his home. From this background the young woman stepped into the new experiences of marriage, and, without belief in or aspirations toward the heaven above, both these people assumed their solemn obligations.

The problem that confronts us in thinking over the situation is, Can a marriage, in the real sense, be considered ethical when it involves denial of Almighty God? Pure ethics and true religion are so intermingled that the divorce of one from the other is impossible. An old writer in the oldest Book in the world said, tersely, long ago, "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." John Bunyan, who had a happy faculty for bestowing names at need, made one of his characters in the Pilgrim's Progress hail from the country of Vain Conceit. One and all, the atheists of to-day have their birth in this mythical land. They are often good neighbors, kind friends and respectable citizens. They have many excellent qualities, and their self-sacrifice in behalf of the community is not to be undervalued. Yet the mists of the land of Vain Conceit hang before their eyes, and they suffer from blindness of mind and from warped and mistaken judgment. When sorrows come to them, they have no one higher and stronger than they to whom they may turn for comfort. Preferring nature to nature's God, their philosophy was that of those ancient peoples who knew no world beyond the visible and tangible one of to-day.

The father's boast that his daughter had never heard the name of God was, on the whole, an idle one. No one can live in this age and in this land, no one can be taught in our schools, no one can read our daily press, no one can breathe our atmosphere and remain in ignorance of the belief of thousands and ten thousands in the pervading presence of God.

The old story of Canute, sitting on the shore and lifting his sceptre against the incoming tide, occurs to us when an atheist calmly affirms that there is no God. He sits on the shore impotent, childish, foolish, and the waves come rolling in from the infinite sea. They will not stop for him. As the Westminster Catechism sublimely expresses it, in its wonderful simplicity, "God is a spirit, infinite, eternal and unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth."

For the little bark confidently launched, with the banner of ethical marriage at her prow, we have no wishes except those of kindness and good will, but we rejoice that such marriages are not destined to become common. We cannot but hope, too, that the percentage of teachers avowedly infidel in our public schools is very small.

"CAN'T YOU DRESS YOURSELF?"

O, mother-love! how true thine heart,—
Thy touch, how tender-kind!
Yet, like its heavenly counterpart,
Thy love must not be blind.

A Centennial Month

THE February of 1909 has for us the peculiar distinction that it will commemorate the centennial of that magnificent statesman and martyr, Abraham Lincoln. Those of us who remember the ominous days that ushered in the tremendous era of our Civil War recall, as no others may, the steadfastness and simplicity and rugged grandeur of Lincoln's character. The 12th of February will be the hundredth anniversary of his birth, and it should be fitly commemorated by Americans. Both North and South to-day reverence the purity and dignity, and the unflawed patriotism, of Abraham Lincoln. He rose from the ranks of the common people, and possessed their sturdy virtues. If ever a man was called of God to lead a nation in a crisis of its history, that man was Lincoln, and his fame gains lustre as the nation forges to the front in the work of the world. Other great men were born a hundred years ago, among them Darwin, Gladstone and Tennyson, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Edgar Allan Poe and Oliver Wendell Holmes.

February 22 is always kept by Americans as the birthday of Washington. George Washington is as honored to-day by the mother country, whose armies he fought, as on our own shores.

These birthdays of our heroes, coming close together in the shortest month of the year, are both legal holidays, when we pause amid the rush of trade and the strife of competition to laurel the graves of our heroic dead. February may well be the proudest month of the twelve.

Society Girls and Charity

People who talk glibly about society girls as mere butterflies of fashion are not always aware that these very girls whose names appear in the annals of the so-called Four Hundred, who have lives of ease and luxury and homes of wealth, really do excellent practical work as benefactors of the poor. Many of these girls are banded together in the Junior League for the Promotion of Neighborhood Work. Their names, if given, would show them to be connected with the most conspicuous families in the republic. Their work is very practical, and is carried forward without a break throughout the incessant rush of the early winter, finding its culmination when the Lenten pause arrests the pace of society. Such girls are finely educated, and they make their education, their knowledge of the world through travel, their picture galleries and their music minister to the needs of girls who lead starved lives in tenements, while every Social Settlement is indebted to them for gifts of money, clothing, and, best of all, of time and interest. The society girl of to-day is much more than a butterfly. She is, in the best sense of the word, a special honey-bee.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—THE USE OF FORKS. Blanche is a little puzzled about when to use a fork. A good rule is, always use a fork when it is possible. Of course, one never eats with a knife. A fork is preferable to a spoon for ice-cream and for fruit sauces which have no syrup.

—M. G. The use of Sir and Madam in familiar address still lingers in the South, but has generally been abandoned in other parts of this country. Children are taught to say "Yes, father," "No, mother," instead of "Yes, sir," and "No, ma'am." Older people say "Yes, Mrs. Wood," "No, Mr. Stone," etc. I prefer Sir and Madam, and confidently expect that they will come in again when ladies and gentlemen return to the stage, and women and men slip into their proper places.

How to Have Joy in Living*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

"THE Happy City," where is it? Where was it?

If some one should put up a sign like this: "To the Happy City, 1,000 miles," on any country road, that road would have the greatest number of travelers of any road anywhere to be found. If any one could mark on the map "The Happy City," that place, although the way might be long, and hedged about with dangers and difficulties, would be the city of the world to which people of every nation would continually resort. As every road in England leads to the King's Highway, and that to London, so every path of the world would connect with the road to the Happy City.

A long time ago, it was said of Samaria, "And there was much joy in that city." Samaria was indeed beautiful for situation, on one of the hilltops near the centre of Palestine, with a variety of scenery, hills and valleys and plains all about it, and a fine view of the sea in the distance; with groves of olive and pomegranates on every side, and beautiful buildings on every street. But these things were not what filled it with joy. Instead, it was because Christ had been preached to the people of Samaria by Philip (the deacon). He had gone there from Jerusalem for that special purpose. Just before and after the martyrdom of Stephen, the Christians were so persecuted that they left Jerusalem in large numbers, and "were scattered abroad." But the twelve apostles remained to do the work in which they were being marvelously assisted by the Holy Spirit. Very likely Philip determined to go to Samaria because he knew that Jesus had once preached the Gospel there for two days, and that many of the Samaritans had believed on him, and had said: "We have heard for ourselves and know that this is indeed the Saviour of the world." And Christ had come again to Samaria in the person of Philip. And when the apostles in Jerusalem heard about the many believers in Jesus in Samaria, converted through the preaching of Philip, they sent Peter and John to Samaria to help the Samaritans still more, for they needed to be told how the Holy Spirit would make them able to heal the sick, and do many wonderful works in the name of Jesus. We are told in the Bible that Peter and John "laid their hands on them and they received the Holy Spirit." And then there was more joy in Samaria than before.

But the joy was marred because of a man who proved to be a hypocrite. It was Simon Magus. We must know that he was a great man in the estimation of some people, because a statue was erected in Rome to his memory, which had on it the inscription, "Simoni Deo Sancto" (To Simon the Holy God). His reputation rested in the deeds of magic which he performed. He had so amazed the people in Samaria with his sorceries that, from the least to the greatest, they said, "This man is of the power of God which is called Great" (Acts 8:9-11). But when they had listened to the preaching of Philip, they had changed their minds. And Simon himself even professed to have been converted. He was ever at the side of Philip, making a close study of the great miracles of healing wrought by him—so much greater than he was able to do that he was himself amazed. And after Peter and John had come, and the Samaritan Christians had themselves received the gift of the Holy Spirit, Simon Magus coveted the gift, that he might be able to do greater works of magic. And the way he took to secure that power, offering money to pay for it, showed that he was insincere in his professed conversion. Peter read his false heart as if it had been an open book, and called upon him to repent of his wickedness and pray for forgiveness. But if the legends we hear about his end have any truth, he did not follow Peter's advice, for it is said that he attempted to fly, as a proof of his supernatural power, and fell and sustained a fracture of his thigh and ankle bones; and that, overcome with vexation, he committed suicide. There is nothing in the Bible about Simon Magus beyond the incident recorded in the eighth chapter of Acts.

The only way to secure it: Dr. E. Benjamin Andrews has said, "Both in his precepts and in his example Christ enjoins men to make all human interests their care." We are to love our neighbors as ourselves, a spirit leading a man to do for others all the good he can, dying for them, if need be. Even to Cæsar we are to render what is his, never grudging. The disaffection toward human government, which the Church of the second and third centuries betrayed, leading some to identify the Roman empire with Satan's kingdom, was not from Jesus Christ, but diametrically opposed to his teachings. And Dr. Andrews further says: "Very deep, when understood rightly, is that thought of the Old Testament that society was instituted by God himself, who deemed it not good for man to be alone." "Man is more glorious than any man."

We have recently been hearing much about living for two weeks as if Christ were in our city. Some cities have tried it, and it seems to have brought about quite a new order of things. And churches have tried it, when it has been supposed that the reason for which churches exist is to exemplify, as near as human beings can, the teachings of Christ. They should do it not only for two weeks, but for all time. It should not be considered a new movement.

It is certainly not a new movement in cities, for by a solemn civic act the old Florentines chose Christ as the King of their city. "Jesus Christ appointed by the Senate the King of Florentines," was the inscription made on the outside of the town hall, but which is now effaced by time, the spot being marked by a sacred monogram. But on the battlements of the tower may still be descried the Latin inscription referring to the same event. "Jesus Christ the King of Glory; he conquers, he reigns, he rules."

On the continent of Europe, the windows of cathedrals are densely curtained during Holy Week, then comes the final day of hallelujah. Suddenly burst forth the words, "Gloria in Excelsis." In an instant every curtain is swept away, and the cathedral is bathed in glory, the organ trembles its notes, the bells chime, flowers are thrown from the galleries, little birds are set free, friends embrace and greet each other, and all the sea of faces below is floating in a mist of sunlit splendor. And yet the means of all this transformation is simply the common light of day. And so the joy which burst upon Samaria was simply that the people opened their hearts to the waiting, knocking Christ, and the sunlight of a wonderful peace and love broke in upon them. And so did the people of Florence. And so should we do in the cities of our beloved land. Dr. Washington Gladden has said:

"It is a glorious thing to be called into the kingdom at such a time as this —to have part in the work of spreading in the world the kingdom of good will, of bringing down to earth the city in which there shall be no more curse and none to hurt or destroy; in which 'all men's good' shall be 'each man's rule.'"

Christian Citizenship

What it is has been thus defined:

"It is the application of the principles of Jesus Christ to public affairs.

"It is the people of God standing unitedly against public evils.

"It is the 'light'—the 'salt'—practically applied, for expelling the darkness and corruption from the politics of this nation.

"It is a recognition of the fact that the power for the correction of public evils lies in the hands of Christian people.

"It is a crystalizing Christian sentiment into united activity against the forces of evil.

"It is greater than the temperance work; greater than all the movements against crime, vice and corruption, because it includes them all, and lays foundations of righteousness upon which all moral reforms must rest."

And the outcome of this will be the abolition of saloons. If there is to be "joy" in our cities our young people should be safely housed at night, under the benign regulations of a curfew law (more than one thousand cities in the United States have such a law). Henry Ward Beecher said, "After dark the streets of our cities are schools of crime." This will not be the case in the city where the law of Christ is made the rule.

Rev. John Telford has said: "The enlightened disciple must use his personal influence in his home, his business and his politics. His life as a citizen must bear the test of our Lord's teaching. And as all the world comes under the spell of Christ, and seeks in his power to reproduce his character and copy his life, the New Jerusalem will descend from God. Henry Venn said long ago: 'Christ went about doing good. This is the pattern for every Christian. He is a counterfeit one who does not strive to imitate it. The strength, the alacrity, the joy of the soul depend on that imitation.' That is true, and the multiplication of such lives brings down the New Jerusalem. A drunkard's conversion can change a home which has been a horror and disgrace into a bit of the City of God. To see this vision, and live to realize it, adds joy to every day of service."

The Present Challenge

It is thus expressed by a prominent Protestant clergyman: "The work to be done is a man's job—evangelization, civic betterment, the financing of the new kingdom! Are you going to be on the firing line? Some men spend their time in the smoke of battle, others amid the smoke of clubs and fraternities. Christ is calling his soldiers to mobilization, sacrifice, hardship, the long march—and victory!"

If there is to be joy in the city, it must first be in the hearts of individuals. At the seashore were a number of people running to the water's edge, and a boat putting off in haste. It was after a youth, who in bathing had got out of his depth and sunk. After remaining for a quarter of an hour under water, he was taken out and restoratives promptly applied, to rekindle if possible the spark of life. Many waited at the door of the building to ascertain whether he was likely to recover. Several came out, but to tell of no hope. At last a person darted out of the house, the bearer of better tidings: "He has caught a breath!" The crowd eagerly echoed the cry, and it carried great joy to all who heard it. Such is the gladness of every true Christian on earth, and also of the angels in heaven, when the news goes forth in regard to one who was out of Christ: "Behold, he prayeth!" But deeper still is the joy of that Christian who has prayed and labored for such a soul's conversion.

Answered Prayers

D. H. S., Indianapolis, Ind. "With a very thankful heart I acknowledge that God has just answered two of my prayers."

A. M., Oregon. "I wish to acknowledge in your 'Answered Prayers' column that our Father has answered my prayers."

L. F., New York. "I promised my Heavenly Father to acknowledge his goodness in answering my prayer. I called upon him, and he heard me."

A. C. S., Shelton, Conn. I believe God has heard and answered my prayers in the past, one in particular, which I promised to acknowledge."

Mrs. B. M. L., California. "My grandson was very sick a short time ago, and I promised God if he would restore him to health I would write it in THE HERALD."

C. S. J., New Jersey. "I have felt that it was not only my duty, but my privilege, to testify to our Father's goodness in answering my prayers on my son's behalf."

C. W. B., Webb., Ia. "Several years ago I was almost instantly healed from the effects of paralysis, without any petition from me; it was as if the Saviour stood and said, 'Wilt thou be made whole?' and believing, the work was done."

H. Y., New York. "If I live until January 26, 1908, I will be ninety years old. I wish to acknowledge the many answers that God has granted to my prayers in these long years. I wish also to state that since 1892 I have been a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and it has been a source of a great deal of comfort and blessing to me."

A. T. B., Jamaica Plain, Mass. "A few weeks ago, a patient was threatened with a difficulty that would require surgical procedure. I took the matter to our heavenly Father, with the result that great improvement took place. In the prayer, I determined to publicly acknowledge the answer. After a number of experiences of such nature, one may understand how the prophets of old heard the voice of God and gave to the world the teachings they received."

Questions and Answers

Reader, Westminster, Vt. Do volcanic eruptions ever occur in cold Northern climates where there is snow?

That they do is proved by the existence of more or less active volcanoes in Alaska and Iceland. See any good encyclopedia for information as to causes of earthquakes and the formation of mountains.

Mrs. F. S., Birmingham, Ala. Who made the marriage ceremony as it is now used by the churches?

No fixed or prescribed form existed in early Christian times, but witnesses were required and the dowry was stated in writing. Certain laws were enacted in the eighth century, prescribing ceremonial forms. Publishing banns, the exchange of pledges and a public betrothal were known as early as the twelfth century and at the wedding the ring was used and the bridal pair were crowned with garlands while the minister or priest held a simple service suited to the occasion. Different forms were used in Scotland, England and on the Continent. Finally, in 1757, by the passage of Lord Hardwicke's Act, a regular Episcopal Church ceremony was established in Britain. In 1836 this was made general among other churches. It is the basis of the modern marriage ceremony.

M. E. D., York, Pa. Please explain Luke 12:33.

It is a more vivid expression of the same advice that is found in Matt. 19:21. Jesus meant to impress his hearers with the folly of bending their energies to the accumulation of worldly possessions, which they might be deprived of in a moment; and to teach them that all wealth is a trusteeship or stewardship, to be used for God's glory and the benefit of humanity.

Mrs. H. de B., Dayton, Wash. Who are the Nestorians, where do they live, and what is their religious belief?

They are the descendants of a sect of early Christians, named after Nestorius, a theologian of the fifth century A. D. They claim also to be descended from Abraham, and sometimes call themselves Chaldeans. They are probably the oldest of the Oriental churches. They are found in Persia, in India, East Indies, Syria, Arabia, Asia Minor, and even in Cochin China, the principal settlements, however, being in and near Persia. They believe Christ to be both divine and human—two persons, with only a moral and sympathetic union. They do not believe in any divine humiliation nor any exaltation of humanity in Christ. They acknowledge the supreme authority of the Scriptures and believe they contain all that is essential to salvation. The main body of Nestorians is nominally Christian, but it is a lifeless Christianity. They have no images, but they invoke the Virgin and the saints and are ignorant and superstitious.

W. S. T., West Somerville, Mass. 1. With wireless telegraphy available, are not long-flight tests of carrier or homing pigeons acts of cruelty? 2. If such flights are justifiable, what purposes do they serve?

1. They may still be used in places where the wireless has not been installed. We have never heard the flights of homing pigeons called "acts of cruelty." Besides serving a useful purpose, they illustrate the home instinct and wonderful intelligence of these birds. 2. As a means of communication they are still used by land and sea. The pigeon's message has sometimes been the means of saving human life.

Rev. J. H. Hanstine, Mount Morris, Ill., writes: "I frequently notice in papers and magazines, and sometimes hear from pulpit and platform, some very wild and incorrect statements regarding Bible circulation, the progress of Christianity, and the various populations of the world. The 'three thousand converts' on the day of Pentecost were genuine converts, but the five hundred million Christians of to-day are only nominal Christians. The Missionary Review of the World says that only about sixty millions can be called actual Christians. In round numbers, the population of the world is usually given in this manner: One-third, nominal Christians, 500,000,000; two-thirds, heathen, 1,000,000,000; total population of the world, 1,500,000,000. Approximately, the nominal Christians are thus classified: Nominally Protestant, 160,000,000; Roman Catholic, 240,000,000; Greek Catholic, Abyssinian, Armenian, etc., 100,000,000; total nominal Christians, 500,000,000. Of the 160,000,000 nominally Protestant, as has been already stated, only about 60,000,000 can be called actual Christians. Here is another statement of misleading character: It is often said that there are now 5,000,000 Christians on foreign mission fields, as the result of missionary effort. Here again the word "nominal" should be inserted before the word "Christian." The case stands like this: Enrolled communicant members, 1,600,000; sympathizers, adherents and students, 3,400,000; nominal Christians on foreign mission fields, 5,000,000. As generally recognized, the 1,000,000,000 heathen are composed of Mohammedans, Confucianists, Buddhists, Hindus and polytheists or common idolaters. So subtracting the 1,600,000 "enrolled communicant members" from the 1,000,000,000 heathen, we have 998,400,000 "yet to be reached." Sixty million actual Christians form one twenty-fifth of the population of the world. How long will it require to convert the remaining twenty-four twenty-fifths? It need not require more than the present century. Just consider this simple statement: If every person now a Christian, and every person becoming a Christian, would be instrumental in saving one soul each year the whole world would be converted in five years."

A. L. M., Rantoul, Kan. 1. Would you advise a box supper or a social programme as a means to supply a minister's salary? 2. What is meant by this passage of Scripture: "For every idle word a man shall speak he shall give an account in the day of judgment"? 3. Can we claim that the place where prayer is offered and God's word is preached and Sunday School is held, is God's house? Can we expect reverence in a schoolhouse?

1. We do not favor such expedients for raising funds for church purposes. The members ought to be willing to bear their share of the burden without resorting to box suppers, etc. We are not forgetful of the fact, however, that such things may have their legitimate uses in bringing the members together in a social way. 2. It is a warning against foolish conversation, gossip and levity, to which many are addicted. 3. Wherever God's people meet for worship can properly be called a "house of God." Some have met in barns and outhouses, and some even in the open, under trees. If the people are too poor to build a church, a schoolhouse may be suitably used. Many a church has had its foundation in a schoolhouse.

S. M. S., Mansfield, O. 1. Who bore expense of Tuberculosis Congress at Washington, D. C., and in New York? Was there admission? 2. Who will pay for Roosevelt's trip to Africa?

1. The expenses of the Tuberculosis Exposition, New York City, were borne by private gifts from wealthy people. No admission was charged, either in New York or in Washington. The congress at Washington was of short duration, and the expenses were not nearly so large. We do not know by what organization or people the funds were furnished. 2. President Roosevelt pays the expenses for his African trip out of his own pocket, including the expenses of his party. The Smithsonian Institution will furnish part of the outfit in return for specimens secured by Mr. Roosevelt. Probably his magazine articles will cover most of the traveling expenses. He will not leave until some time after his term of office expires.

E. W. K., Egypt, Pa. How much, if any of the expenses incident to the maintenance of the White House and social affairs, are borne by the government; how much by the President? Does his salary include these expenses?

The national government pays for the care of the house and grounds. All supplies for the White House and the entire expense of entertaining, both official and private, are paid for by the President out of his salary. The various receptions and dinners given by the President to diplomats, distinguished foreign guests, etc., are a necessary adjunct to the Presidential office, and the President could not avoid them even if he wished to. He has to represent the hospitality of the nation to the rest of the world. In fact, the expenses of the office are so great that few Presidents have been able to save anything from their salary during their term of office.

B. L., Jacksonville, Fla. Please describe the nature and operation of the referendum.

It is a popular vote on legislative proposals which have been considered by the proper legislative body, and it gives to the people themselves the final power of ratification, amendment or nullification of such laws as are so submitted. It apparently operates satisfactorily in Switzerland, where it was established in 1874. It was at first objected that the referendum would "destroy the independence of Parliament," but it has not done so.

S. R., Stamford, Neh. Did King Saul talk with Samuel's spirit, that the witch of Endor called up?

Commentators point out the fact that the importance of the event to Saul did not consist in what he saw or did not see, but in the message received. The Biblical account indicates that Saul accepted the woman's description of her vision. She was a wizard or necromancer, and it was customary for such to use a feigned voice, which seemed to proceed from underground (see Isa. 29:4). Josephus elaborates the story of this incident.

C. G. E., Abilene, Kan. 1. How fast does sound travel? 2. Is the famous John Ruskin still living; if not, when did he die?

1. Sound travels at the rate of 1,090 feet a second in air, and at a varying rate in other media. 2. John Ruskin spent the latter part of his life, from 1885 to 1900, at his home, Brantwood, near Coniston, England, where he died January 20, 1900.

R. H. F., Flushing, L. I. Can you tell me in THE MAIL-BAG whether Washington crossed the Delaware on a raft or boat? Did they take horses with them?

Washington crossed the Delaware in a large rowboat. The horses of the field officers, batteries, etc., were carried over in small boats. The painting of "Washington Crossing the Delaware," which hangs in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York City, is quite accurate in its details. It has been extensively reproduced in histories of the United States.

A. C. S., Rochester, N. Y. 1. Whom did Cain marry? 2. Does God pass judgment on people when they die, or does he wait until the Judgment Day?

1. Name of Cain's wife nowhere stated. 2. All that we know of the Judgment Day is revealed in Scripture. According to the ablest Bible interpreters, the soul will be either happy or miserable immediately after death, but the general judgment will not be till after the resurrection. See Heb. 9:27; Acts 17:31; II. Peter 3:7, and other passages.

I. M., Martinsburg, Neb. In Christ's teaching of the destruction of Jerusalem, who were the elect to be saved? Were they the prisoners taken to Rome?

Christ was picturing a coming period of persecution, and his expression, "He that endureth to the end shall be saved," is repeatedly used in connection with similar warnings. See Matt. 10:22; Mark 13:13. He was warning his followers of the severe trials in store for them and encouraging them to stand fast in the faith. That the words "shall be saved" were meant to have a spiritual application would seem to be quite clear from Heb. 10:32-39, and similar passages. It was a warning against iniquity cooling the love even of his faithful disciples. In Luke 21:16-19 it is shown that the promise did not imply immunity from mere bodily harm.

G. M. S., Charlotteville, N. Y. 1. Where in the New Testament is the doctrine of restitution taught? 2. Please explain the difference between the "righteous man" and the "holy man," mentioned in Rev. 22:11; that is, the difference between holiness and righteousness.

1. See Matt. 5:26; Luke 16:10-12; Luke 19:8, 9; Rom. 13:8; Philemon 18. The Roman law (in Christ's day) directed a fourfold restitution, which explains Zaccheus' statement in Luke 19:8. His generous addition of "the half of his goods," though not demanded by the law, was evidently heard with approval of the spirit which prompted it. Moralists hold that we are bound to restore the thing owed, in kind, if possible, with the natural increase added. This seems to have been the view adopted by the early Christian Church. 2. "Righteous" or "unrighteous" relates to one's attitude toward his fellow-men—his honesty, justice, probity, etc.; "holiness" means consecration to the Lord. The terms are not synonymous.

C. E. T., Jonestown, Pa. Explain Luke 24:39. Did Jesus ascend into heaven as he appeared to the people on earth?

It was an offer to give the doubters both ocular and tangible demonstration of the reality of his resurrection. It implied the identity, though with diversity of laws, of the resurrection body. See I. Cor. 15:35, which shows that while this body shall be so raised as to preserve its identity, it must yet undergo certain purifying and spiritualizing changes to fit it for the kingdom. It must be a "glorified body," like that of Christ (verse 49; also Rom. 6:9; Phil. 3:21). It was in his glorified bodily form that Christ ascended.

W. G., Gagetown, Mich. Can you give me the main facts about Fort Sumter?

Fort Sumter is in Charleston harbor, S. C., about half way between Morris and Sullivan Islands, and three and one-half miles from Charleston city. It was begun in 1823. In 1861 General Beauregard and a force of 1,000 Confederates bombarded the fort for three days, and Major Anderson was compelled to evacuate. It was attacked in 1863 by the Federal troops. On April 14, 1865, Major Anderson again took possession in the name of the Federal government. It is still the property of the government.

Mrs. M., Plainfield, N. J. What is your opinion as to the propriety of attending the performance of such pieces as the opera of Salome?

We have never witnessed its production, but understand that Straus's music is beautiful. We have examined the libretto, however, and regard it as sugar-coated vice. Such performances do much to confirm the growing conviction that, in New York at least, the "limit" has been reached in the presentation of the vicious in drama and opera. There is not a shred of foundation, not even the pretext of a tradition, for the story of Salome's sulphurous passion, and the whole theme of the opera is a gross violation of decency and an impious distortion of a Scriptural incident.

Miscellaneous

Any reader of this paper knowing of the whereabouts of Mrs. Elizabeth Bing, lately of Macleod, Alberta, Canada, is requested to send her present address to H. Murray Bing, care of F. Rudd, Ballenburg, Alberta, Canada, or to Mrs. J. Shaver, Macleod, Alberta, Canada.

E. H. S., Santa Barbara, Calif. One who is in debt, and who has the means to pay his honest debts, does wrong morally to divert his money to other purposes. For a man to neglect his debts and expend his money in gifts is clearly wrong. He is catering to his own vanity and robbing others.

Rev. W. R. Burkeholder, State Line, Pa.: "I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years. I never read such soul-stirring sermons as are coming from the American pulpit of to-day. I wish to express thanks to the ministers of the Gospel for the spiritual sermons which are given through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

Reader, New York. The Mission Yacht Association is an incorporated society, which distributes religious and general literature among seamen on incoming foreign and domestic vessels in New York harbor. Its yacht, the Messenger, under Captain Benn, is doing excellent work. Its Board of Directors includes the names of the best known men in the shipping trade of the port. H. M. DeMott, Mechanics' Bank, Brooklyn, N. Y., is the treasurer, to whom all contributions in aid of the work should be addressed. The society's headquarters are at 619 Fifty-eighth Street, Brooklyn, N. THE GOSPEL IN SAMARIA

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

OUR Lord's commission to his chosen apostles was that the Gospel should be preached "in Jerusalem, in all Judea, then in Samaria, and then to the uttermost part of the earth." Before it could reach "all Judea," the rulers of the Jews had rejected the Gospel. As representatives of the people, they rejected God's Messiah. Now, Samaria was to have her day of visitation.

Philip, who went down to Samaria, made no attempt to gain the people by bringing some extraordinary attraction to bear upon them; he knew that he was sent of God, and he knew that God would take the responsibility of preparing the way for his own Word. The modern plan of attracting people to the Gospel by pandering to their worldly tastes had not yet been invented. Philip neither got up concerts, entertainments, nor bazaars; he only preached Christ. It is degrading to Christianity when the professed winners of souls try to make up for their lack of Holy Ghost power by the use of worldly and fleshly inducements to win men to the Saviour!

What kind of converts are the result? Just such as themselves: and thousands of such will find at the last day that they have made an awful mistake, and that they are not converted at all. What! shall we win men from "this present evil world" (Gal. 1: 4) by offering to them a portion of their loved pleasures in order to induce them to renounce the rest? Shall we countenance a kind of Gospel which springs neither from God nor from the Bible, which says that if men only believe in the sacrifices of Christ for them, and become members of churches, they may live, talk, dress, do business, and act exactly as though they were unconverted—in fact, that their chief aim must be to conceal from the world that they belong to Christ, and to prove the word of God untrue where it says, "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new" (II. Cor. 5: 17)? The early Church understood the true relations between God and man—i. e., that man exists for God, and not God for man; that man is created, redeemed, saved, sanctified, healed for God's use and glory, not for himself.

Even in the early times, there were false disciples. One of these, Simon, an ex-sorcerer, had formerly obtained great power over the people through the spiritualism of those days; he had bewitched the people, who looked upon him as the great power of God, for he gave out that "himself was some great one." It is not unusual to hear Christian workers boasting of their overflowing meetings, of the many souls they have been the means of leading to Christ, of the power of their holiness meetings, and of their great faith, etc. Alas, alas! they are not free from the spirit which actuated Simon the sorcerer; in their eyes, they themselves are great ones. When Peter and John had been used of God for the healing of the lame man, Peter took the greatest pains to turn the eyes of the people from himself to Jesus; and this is the instinct of every man in whom God really dwells. When we see a preacher looking round with evident disappointment upon a small audience, and seeking the first opportunity of telling what crowds have hung upon his lips elsewhere, it is evident that he believes that himself is some great one, and that he wants other people to believe it, too. If few souls are brought to Christ, and in a spirit of self-justification he tells of numbers having been saved through his instrumentality elsewhere, it is clear that in his own eyes he is the great one on whom success depends. And though in words he would ascribe it to God, yet in his own heart he believes that his services are not easily to be dispensed with. A man who lives and works in the power of God, is conscious of God's power, but knows his own weakness and nothingness in such a way, that he never feels able to speak, or do anything else for God, but just simply trusts to the promise, "It shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak; for it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you" (Matt. 10: 20).

the passing of tax laws, which will permit the perpetuation of existing forests by use; the establishment of State Forestry Commissions, and the creation of the office of State Forester.

State Forest Commissions and officers are now established in over thirty States. They are tremendous leverage in the increasingly popular movement for forest preservation. This movement has also been given impetus through the recent appointment, by President Roosevelt, of the National Conservation Commission, composed of forty-nine leading men of the country and of which Gifford Pinchot, chief forester of the United States, is chairman. Overton W. Price, of the Forest Service, and Henry S. Graves, director of the Yale Forest School, with Senator Beveridge of Indiana, and Champ Clark, of Missouri, are among the members of the Sub-Commission on Forestry, which aims to conserve our great natural forest treasures for the coming generations.

The grocer may sell you a poor lamp-chimney, saying, "it's just as good as the MACBETH chimneys."

But when it breaks from heat you learn that the grocer was mistaken.

My name on a lamp-chimney means that the man who made it says that it will not break from heat—and the man who makes a thing usually knows what it is made of.

MACBETH lamp-chimneys at a few cents apiece more are cheaper than the breaking kind at any price.

My Lamp-Chimney Book insures getting the right chimney for any burner, and gives suggestions about lamps, chimneys, wicks, oils, and tells how to keep lamps in order. I gladly mail it, free, to anyone who writes for it. Address

GOOD CHANGE

Coffee to Postum.

The large army of persons who have found relief from many chronic ailments by changing from coffee to Postum as a daily beverage, is growing each day.

It is only a simple question of trying it for oneself in order to know the joy of returning health as realized by an Ills. young lady. She writes:

"I had been a coffee drinker nearly all my life and it affected my stomach — caused insomnia and I was seldom without a headache. I had heard about Postum and how beneficial it was, so concluded to quit coffee and try it.

"I was delighted with the change. I can now sleep well and seldom ever have headache. My stomach has gotten strong and I can eat without suffering afterwards. I think my whole system greatly benefited by Postum.

"My brother also suffered from stomach tronble while he drank coffee, but now, since using Postum he feels so much better he would not go back to coffee for anything."

The Little Doctor

A New Serial Story Written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

George Hunter and Dudley Verner were college chums and are stopping at the country home of the former. George is introduced to Miss Danforth, daughter of Squire Danforth, who lives on the fine estate called "Paradise." A village character, Jack Green, takes them to see "Paradise." They there meet Miss Danforth, and Dudley is introduced. As they leave, the Squire drives by on the way home. His daughter is surprised at his sudden return. He says he is going abroad, and will take her and her aunt. They go to call on Mrs. Hunter and her niece, Miss Sanborn. The Squire discovers that Mrs. Hunter is an old friend. On his return he tells Aunt Phœbe a family secret, which greatly agitates her. Dudley Verner starts life as a doctor in a quiet neighborhood. The two friends save a little boy named Donald Fraser from being run over. Mrs. Fraser was George's aunt, who had run away to marry Captain Fraser. They lost track of her. George finds she has been badly treated and deserted. Mrs. Fraser discovers that her husband still lives and again disappears. Squire Danforth finds a friend in an insane asylum who has information which may lift, his daughter writes, a cloud from his life. George's mother proposes to go to Long Branch. Jack Green comes to George and informs him that Captain Fraser was looking for the Hunter family to find his wife. George has his mother and cousin prepare for an early start. Green drives Fraser to the Hunter home so slowly that he arrives too late. The Hunter party stops in New York. Captain Fraser finds them and demands to see Mrs. Hunter and his wife. He will not believe that the latter is not with them. George comes in and informs him he knows something about him which will put him in safe keeping for some time. The captain leaves. Mrs. Hunter is hurried to Long Branch. The young men out walking think they see Donald Fraser, but he disappears in the crowd. Verner tells George the story of his life; that he was adopted while Mr. Verner was traveling in Spain. George and Dudley rescue Donald from a kidnapper and George is hurt. Mrs. Fraser and Donald are brought to Mrs. Hunter.

ARRANGEMENTS were made to accommodate the new members of the family, Ellen Fraser and her son Donald, who were henceforth to remain with them and take possession of their rights, according to the provisions of Mr. Hunter's will. Lily now met Ellen for the first time, and they were mutually attracted.

It is wonderful what a medicine happiness is. Already Mrs. Hunter seemed to have grown stronger, and after she and Lily retired for the night she talked long of the old days and of the future. She was truly thankful that, as George had said, little Donald was "a real Hunter," and in no respect resembled Captain Fraser.

She wakened early, contrary to her usual custom, and the great joy that had been last in her thoughts when she retired rushed upon her in her first waking moments, with the thought, "All my dear ones are here now."

As soon as Elsie, who slept in the adjoining room, heard her stir she made haste to prepare a cup of coffee and a slice of toast, and, tapping at her door, hardly waited for her gentle "Come in" to bring her offering.

"I thought ye wad need this to hearten ye up a bit before ye rise," she said; and Mrs. Hunter, with tears in her eyes, thanked her ever faithful handmaiden and said, "You understand me, Elsie. I must be up and dressed to see my restored treasures and make sure they have not flown."

"Nae fear o' that, my dear mistress. They are awaiting down the stair, happy and anxious to see you."

When Dudley arrived, he found the entire family gathered on the piazza, enjoying the morning breeze.

After breakfast they assembled in the sitting-room, and Donald, who sprang to meet George the moment he entered, whispered, "Are you going to tell auntie now about the bad man who tried to steal me and hurt you so much?"

George replied, "Not yet, my boy. I will tell her by and by."

It was decided that the family should remain at the seaside until October, in the hope that Mrs. Fraser, Donald and George, as well as Mrs. Hunter, should gain much needed strength.

When Mrs. Hunter inquired concerning the cause of George's illness, he had laughingly replied, "Oh, one cannot always be well, you know."

Donald now had a constant companion in his rambles on the seashore, and he was very happy. The thin little face began to round out and the childish laughter was full of joy.

Ellen's face, too, grew smooth and happy, and lost its old look of anxiety and care. Her coming life, indeed, appeared like a glad holiday awaiting her. She could not refuse her brother's legacy, which had been gradually accumulating, so that there was an abundance for herself and her child. For the present, however, no one could think of a separation, and they were all to return together to their beautiful country home at Branksome.

Her tears fell fast as she heard from his wife's lips the story of her brother's love and longing for her, and the thoughtful care that had provided for her future.

There was no word of reproach for the returned wanderer. Her gentle, loving sister-in-law thought that she had suffered enough, without having the sad past recalled.

Day after day passed quietly away. She tried to "forget the things that were behind," and for the sake of the dear child depending upon her to "press forward," although sometimes heart and flesh would fail, and the longing for eternal rest would almost swallow up the thought of present duty and future happiness.

She shared with them Marian Danforth's charming letters; and, learning of Mrs. Hunter's early acquaintance with Squire Danforth, she heard with interest of his delightful home, and anticipated with much pleasure the return of the wanderers.

Dudley rejoiced in the improvement which had come to them all, but especially in the almost miraculous return to health of his friend; for George now seemed to have recovered entirely.

Now Dudley's days were full of pleasure between his absorbing home work and the hours at the seaside spent with his beloved friends.

The days sped by as if on wings. Sea breezes and cheerful surroundings were doing their work, and the sick and weary ones became strong and well.

George and his little nephew, as week after week went by, grew closer and closer in a bond of friendship and love. Both were tanned by the wind and sun as they romped together on the beach and plunged in the breakers, shouting and laughing as though they were two children together.

Just as the lovely, mellow autumn days drew on, and they were making ready to tear themselves away from the spot where they had been so happy, a letter from abroad was received; and the family party, including Dudley, who was a frequent visitor, gathered on the piazza to listen to it, as Lily read it aloud. It was dated at Glasgow, and ran as follows:

"MY DEAR FRIENDS:

"For the last time before leaving for home I date my letter in Scotland. We hope, now that my father has finished the perplexing business which has detained us here, to sail for New York early in October. Then what do you think we propose doing next?

"My father has the charge of some business interests connected with a plantation in Mexico, of what nature I have not inquired, and he has not thought proper to tell me.

"It is in the State of Yucatan, that old historic place; and, as nothing can be settled satisfactorily until he goes, we (for, of course, I accompany him) expect to leave late in December or early in January. The only months that are quite safe there for foreigners, on account of the unhealthy climate, are January, February and March.

"My father found it necessary to visit again the asylum at Morningside, and, as Aunt Phœbe dislikes travel, we two went alone.

"My father was much interested in what you wrote me of Dr. Verner's busy life and in the incidents which Mr. Hunter had related to you. His eyes filled with tears, and he said, 'I am glad to hear that,Marian, my child, very glad. I believe I never did Dr. Verner justice. I trust that when we return we shall see him often at our home, in company with Mr. Hunter and his cousin.

" 'We will try to make life brighter and more cheerful for you in the future than it has been in the past.' "

CHAPTER XIV

THE letter was enjoyed by all, and the news of the expected return of the travelers caused general rejoicing.

"Mrs. Fraser, you will like the squire and his daughter very much," said Dudley, who thought he could foresee a helper and comforter for the lonely woman in the bright and cheerful young girl.

"I truly believe I shall. I have tried to imagine what she looks like. Cannot some one of you describe her appearance?"

"No, Aunt Ellen, it would be quite impossible for any of us to do that," said George.

"Is she pretty?"

"Pretty? Yes. but she is more than pretty. She is a magnificent woman—such as one rarely sees in a whole lifetime."

"Why, George, your praise raises hopes in my mind. What inference am I to draw from your remarks?"

"None at all, auntie. Miss Danforth is one to be worshiped at a distance. I hardly think she cares to marry."

Dudley said, with a laugh, "Time will tell, young man."

"Well," said Mrs. Fraser, "if she is all she is represented to be, the man who secures such a treasure must be something more than common, to be worthy of her."

"I wonder how long they will stay in Mexico," said Dudley. "The part of the country which they are to visit is very warm, and it is unsafe for those not acclimated to spend there any part of the season later than April, because of the lurking fevers; but, of course, such an intelligent man as Squire Danforth will be well posted in regard to all these matters."

"I suppose Aunt Phœbe will not accompany them," said Mrs. Hunter, "as she has such an aversion to travel."

"It will be just as well if she does not," said Dudley. "The traveling conveniences in Mexico are not equal to ours, and the heat in Yucatan is too great for an old person unaccustomed to a warm climate."

"Well, I am glad we are to have them at home for a time before starting on such a long, dangerous journey," said Mrs. Hunter, "and I do wish it was over."

That night more than one of the party who had wished, like her, that the journey was over safely, dreamed of the travelers. Dudley's dream made a great impression on him, and it was long ere he could shake it off.

He seemed to be in Mexico, on a plantation and surrounded by orange and other tropical trees. Rare flowers bloomed in rich profusion, and the air was vocal with the songs of birds. As he approached an open well, built like the old Egyptian wells which one sees in many parts of Mexico, on its wall, reaching a few feet above the ground, sat a woman, fair and beautiful. A young girl, not unlike Marian Danforth, came forward and drew some water; then, dipping a silver goblet in it, she offered him a drink as he approached. The woman, who sat on the well, turned her beautiful eyes upon him and said, "Have I found you at last, dear child?" Leading him to the young girl, she took her hand and put it in his. Then, with a beautiful smile, she turned and left them alone.

He awoke with a start, and, although it was very early, made haste to rise and dress. Then he went out to the beach for a stroll.

At last the lovely resting time by the sea had come to an end and preparations were on foot for the return of the family to Branksome. George was to accompany them home, returning as soon as possible to his law office, from which he had so long been absent.

The home in the country, as they approached, was very beautiful to the eyes of the strangers. Mrs. Hunter clasped her sister's hand and said, "We are almost home now, dear Ellen—your home and mine. Please God, we will not be separated any more."

"I am glad it is a new home," she replied. "I do not think I could have borne it to return to the old home, the one I so wildly and foolishly left."

"My dear Ellen, let us forget the things that are behind. For the sake of the child, look on the bright side of life. Surely there is sunshine beyond the clouds for you."

By this time Ellen was quietly weeping, and could only by a great effort compose herself before Donald, who, as a great treat, had been taken up on the driver's seat by George, opened the door and shouted, "We are home, mamma."

The days sped on quietly and happily with the reunited family at Branksome, the "boys" making frequent visits home. Little Donald was very happy, and had become a great favorite with every one.

ITALY

By Charles E. Lyman

O LAND of art and beauty beyond compare,
Bright are thy skies, soft is thy balmy air;
We dream of thee!
Thy springs flow clear from many snow-clad heights;
Thy fields and mountains gleam with rosy lights,
Fair Italy!

The Roman legions that, with martial tread,
Marched forth to conquer kingdoms, now are dead,
Entombed with thee;
And many whom the world delights to own,
Whose names will ever live, are thine alone,
Proud Italy!

But o'er thy bright and cheerful homes deep gloom
Is cast; we see a rent and open tomb;
Thy people flee.
The earthquake shock, Stromboli's fitful flame,
With loud and terrifying voice proclaim Dark Italy.

Where is the teeming life that once was thine,
That dwelt serene midst olive tree and vine
In Sicily?
Swept from their scenes of pleasure and of trade,
Beneath thy clear blue waters they are laid,
Sad Italy.

We will not leave thee thus to mourn alone;
Mankind are brothers in every clime and zone;
We plead for thee.
Across the seas our ships with aid we send,
And with it love and warmest greetings blend
For Italy.

What Will You Give To Be Well

I CANNOT tell you how happy I am that I have been able to bring health and strength to 30,000 women in the past six years. Just think! this means a whole city. It is to my thorough study of anatomy, physiology and health principles, and to my 12 years' personal experience before I began my instructions by mail, that I attribute my marvelous success. It would do your heart good to read the reports from my pupils—and I have done all this by simply studying Nature's laws adapted to the correction of each individual difficulty. If vital organs or nerve centers are weak, I strengthen them so that each organ does its work.

To Have Good Figure, Vibrant Health, Rested Nerves?

I want to help every woman to be perfectly, gloriously well, with that sweet, personal loveliness which health and a wholesome, graceful body gives—a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose, full of the health and vivacity which makes you

A Better Wife
A Rested Mother
A Sweeter Sweetheart

I bring each pupil to symmetrical proportions and I teach her to stand and to walk in an attitude which bespeaks culture and refinement. A good figure, gracefully carried, means more than a pretty face. Nature's rosy cheeks are more beautiful than paint or powder. I help you to

Arise to Your Best!

The day for drugging the system has passed. In the privacy of your own room, I strengthen the muscles and nerves of the vital organs, lungs and heart and start your blood to circulating as it did when you were a child. I teach you to breathe so that the blood is fully purified.

You Can Be Well Without Drugs

And the vital strength gained by a forceful circulation relieves you of such chronic ailments as

Constipation Dullness
Torpid Liver Irritability
Indigestion Nervousness
Rheumatism Sleeplessness
Weaknesses Weak Nerves
Catarrh

by strengthening whatever organs or nerves are weak.

I wish I could put sufficient emphasis into these words to make you realize that you do not need to be ill, but that you can be a buoyant, vivacious, attractive woman in return for just a few minutes' care each day in your own home.

Individual Instruction—I give each pupil the individual, confidential treatment which her case demands. My information and advice are entirely free.

Too Fleshy? You can easily remove the fat and it will stay removed. I have reduced 15,000 women. One pupil writes me:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I feel so well I want to shout! I never get out of breath now.

"When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy, I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Too Thin? I may need to strengthen your stomach, intestines and nerves first. A pupil who was thin, writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman."

"My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

A CORSET IS NOT NEEDED FOR A GOOD FIGURE

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you. I never treat a patient I cannot help. If I cannot help you I will refer you to the help you need.

Send me 10 cents for instructive booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly.

✳ Young People's Societies ✳

Present-Day Pioneers*

EVERY member of every church in America, especially every young member, should read at least once a month Dr. Josiah Strong's book, Our Country. Conditions have somewhat changed during the years since that was written, but its main contention is unaltered. The first and foremost consideration with us all should be the winning of our own beloved country for Christ.

Without belittling the important cause of foreign missions, we may still urge the paramount claims of our home field. There is nothing which cuts the true American patriot like the allegation often made, especially by visiting foreigners, that our cities are no better than those of any other country—possibly worse than those of most of them; that they do not see how we dare to try to foist our national religion (so far as we have one) upon foreign peoples, when it has worked so little good at home; and the skeptical dictum, also often made, that our churches are losing influence, and do not begin to command the respect that they received a generation ago.

Are these terrible indictments true? Many of us—undoubtedly most of us—do not believe that they are. The critics who pass these hard opinions are usually superficial, prejudiced or flippantly irreligious people. Still, such strictures are passed, and sometimes so seriously and by such important authorities that we shall do well to heed them, and to redouble our efforts in the home field.

It is sometimes a thankless task—but missionary work is often that—perhaps usually. The reward is in the soul.

Arnot, in commenting on this subject, used the following striking words: "As radii in a circle are closest near the centre, and toward the circumference lie more widely apart, the affections of the human heart do and should fall thickest on those who are nearest. Expressly on this principle the Christian mission was instituted at first. Love in the heart of the first disciples was recognized by Him who kindled it, to be of the nature of fire or light. He did not expect it to fall on distant places, without first passing through intermediate space. From Jerusalem, at His command, and under the Spirit's ministry, it radiated through Judea, and from Judea to Samaria, and thence to 'the ends of the earth.'"

We have a nation of about eighty millions of people, and, in round numbers, a million of these, we are told, belong to the criminal class. "It is said," remarks Mr. Moody, in his great sermon on "Redemption," "that, within six months, thirty graduates of two large European universities were found by one rescue mission in New York; nor are our American colleges without representatives in the great city slums. And this in Christian America! Our daily papers are but a living chronicle of the fearful hold which sin has upon us as a nation. . . . Veneering the outer man will make him no better within." Education is good, but it must extend to character in order to make our nation truly great. It is the province of the children of God to elevate the character of their brethren.

"It is to my care that thou hast entrusted my brother," says George Matheson. "His need nerves me. His doubt dedicates me. His peril prompts me." And though all men are our brethren, it is our own countrymen whose need, whose doubt, whose peril should most keenly move us.

Shepherds and Hirelings*

AMONG all the titles by which we address our heavenly Father, none, perhaps, is more intimate and significant than "Our Shepherd." None implies more fully our dependence upon him; none, our own helplessness and unfitness for controlling our own lives. The sheep is one of the least intelligent among animals. It easily goes astray, and has none of the instinct of the dog, the cat, the horse, for finding its way. If the shepherd is not followed, or if the shepherd is not faithful, the sheep are likely to perish. In every sense, Christ is our Good Shepherd. In every sense, we are his silly, dependent flock. There is no safety for us except in closely following him.

It is a proper extension of this beautiful figure that our ministers should also be called our shepherds. This use of the word is authorized by Peter, who speaks of "the chief Shepherd" (I. Pet. 5:4), implying many undershepherds. These were to make themselves "ensamples to the flock," and to "tend" them, "not of constraint, but willingly," and not for "filthy lucre." Only in such case could they receive the "crown of glory, which fadeth not away."

A good illustration of the unfaithful and insincere shepherd, who is but a hireling, working for his own gain, is furnished by Gipsy Smith. It is of a politician, who is trying for election. He goes among the voters. At one place, the wife comes to the door. He asks for the husband, and is invited to sit down and wait for him. If there is a caged bird in the room, it is the finest bird that ever was. If there is a flower in the pot—well, it is a beautiful flower. If there is a dog, he pats the dog. If there is a baby, he does not forget to kiss the baby, though it is not over clean. When the polling day comes, he does not wait for the man to walk, but sends a carriage.

What kind of a guardian of his town's, or county's, or State's interests will such a politician be? He may prove to be a good one, but the chances are against it. He is a hireling, with all of the worst traits of the hireling.

The hireling may do his routine, daily work, but he does not think that he should be expected to go beyond that. It is only the true shepherd that leaves the ninety and nine "in the shelter of the fold," and goes forth in the storm to seek the hundredth sheep that is lost.

It is related of Napoleon, who was a false shepherd, if ever there was one, that at a time when his troops were crossing the Alps, a little drummer boy slipped far down into a crevasse, with an avalanche of snow. The soldiers did not dare, without orders, to stop and rescue him. Napoleon himself was told of the accident—how the little fellow was beating the relief call, and how his comrades longed to help him. But Napoleon said the army could not be halted just to pick up a little insignificant drummer boy; so on they went. The poor child saw after a while that there was to be no rescue, and he began to beat out a funeral march—his own funeral march. Veteran soldiers wept when they heard it. Their wives and children wept when the story was related to them. Yet Napoleon cared nothing for this little lost sheep.

Thank God that we have a Shepherd who is touched with pity for our infirmities—to whom the least of his creatures is dear, who restoreth our souls.

WRONG BREAKFAST

Change Gave Rugged Health.

Many persons think that for strength, they must begin the day with a breakfast of meat and other heavy foods. This is a mistake as anyone can easily discover for himself.

A W. Va. carpenter's experience may benefit others. He writes:

"I used to be a very heavy breakfast eater but finally indigestion caused me such distress, I became afraid to eat anything.

"My wife suggested a trial of Grape-Nuts and as I had to eat something or starve, I concluded to take her advice. She fixed me up a dish and I remarked at the time that the quality was all right, but the quantity was too small—I wanted a saucerful.

"But she said a small amount of Grape-Nuts went a long way and that I must eat it according to directions. So I started in with Grape-Nuts and cream, 2 soft boiled eggs and some crisp toast for breakfast.

"I cut out meats and a lot of other stuff I had been used to eating all my life and was gratified to see that I was getting better right along. I concluded I had struck the right thing and stuck to it. I had not only been eating improper food but too much.

"I was working at the Carpenter's trade at that time and thought that unless I had a hearty breakfast with plenty of meat, I would play out before dinner. But after a few days of my "new breakfast" I found I could do more work, felt better in every way, and now I am not bothered with indigestion."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Bodily Transition*

THIS fleshly body is to be changed into a spiritual body at the last day. And what wonderful transition is to be effected "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." It is no wonder that Paul calls it a mystery. There is some process of divine chemistry, by which the fleshly body will be transmuted into a spiritual body. In this lower life of ours it could not be expected we should understand how such a change can be wrought—a change so momentous and so instantaneous. At the same time it is perfectly credible, and need be no stumbling block to our faith.

If we should look around us, even in this lower world, I think we may find suggestions of such a marvelous transformation being natural and easy. Here, for instance, is the solid globe on which we live. It is careering at an immense rate around the sun. So quick is the earth's motion that it is computed that if she should collide with another body as large, and moving as quickly in the opposite direction, the heat developed by that collision would reduce the whole mass of the earth to vapor, and that in a moment of time. Not only would this globe be burnt to a cinder, but the whole mass would be vaporized in a single instant.

Now, there you see at work a simple natural law, which we see operating every day, but how vast and how sudden the transformation it has wrought. What was solid earth a moment ago is vapor now.

With such a possibility as that in view, and brought about by such a well-known law, who can doubt that this solid body might be changed into an ethereal, spiritual body, in the very twinkling of an eye? What do we know of the forces of nature in the higher realm? What power might not God have at hand to work just such wonder as this?

And if we could see the whole scheme of things, instead of seeing but a very small part, perhaps we might find a law ready-made—which is simply a divine method prearranged—by which this wonderful bodily change will be wrought. Let us not stagger in unbelief at that which some day may seem very easy and plain. In a case like this it seems a more wanton presumption to doubt than to believe.

Dr. Howe did a service to our country in writing his book on the American city. He has now added to this an equally keen and complete analysis of the British type of municipality, giving us a valuable reference book, and, incidentally, national encouragement. Our cities, according to Dr. Howe, are not so free from corruption as those of Great Britain; but they are "sacrificed to the greed of their overlords in Parliament." That, or any equivalent of it, cannot be said of ours.

The Fleet Homeward Bound

THE Prudential Insurance Company is issuing an artistically beautiful picture of the American battleship fleet steaming away from Gibraltar, homeward bound. The picture is in colors, and gives a splendid idea of the beauty and power of the American warships. The scene presents the Connecticut, flying the flag of Rear-Admiral C. S. Sperry, leading the first division of the fleet past the Rock of Gibraltar. It will inspire even the veriest landlubber who doesn't know a belaying pin from a marlinspike. The Prudential has also published a most interesting booklet containing separate pictures of each ship in the fleet, and giving tonnage, speed, armament, number of crew, etc. A copy of either this booklet or picture may be had for the asking. Write to the Prudential Insurance Company of America, Newark, N. J., stating which is preferred, or if both are desired state so in your letter.

The Home Missions Council

NEARLY a year ago, the Home Missions Council was organized, representing seventeen denominations, which united, through their Home Mission Boards and Societies, for counsel and co-operation. The first annual "Publicity Campaign" of the Council was held January 25 and 26. Meetings were held in the Baptist Temple and Central Congregational Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., among the speakers being Rev. H. L. Morehouse, Rev. James I. Vance, Rev. J. Howard Melish, Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, Rev. W. S. Holt, Rev. Frank Mason North, Mr. Harry Wade Hicks, Bishop L. B. Wilson and Rev. Charles Stelzle.

Meetings in continuation of the Publicity Campaign are to be held during February and March, the cities chosen being Hartford, Buffalo, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Baltimore, Atlanta, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Nashville, St. Louis, Kansas City, Omaha, Minneapolis and Chicago. Among the problems on which the Federated Home Missions unite in making appeal for missionary thought and endeavor are: The congestion of cities, immigration, the growth of socialism, the aggressions of fanaticism and superstition, city evangelization, the Church and the labor movement, our expanding frontiers, world redemption, etc.

"The Pictures Are Perfect Gems"

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Many thanks for the beautiful Art Gallery De Luxe. The pictures are perfect gems, each one in itself fit to adorn any home. The premium, After Death, What? I also am so pleased with, and its glimpses into the unseen are so beautiful, that it makes one long for the reality of the "Unfolded Vision." God bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

PRES. WILLIAM McKINLEY SAID:
I am familiar with Ridpath's History of the World, and cordially commend it to the scholar as well as to the plain people generally.

PROF. W. F. WARREN, President Boston University, said:
I should be glad to see it placed in the library of every young person in the United States, and even in the English-speaking world. In families where there are bright children it will render excellent service to the cause of popular intelligence.

THE Publishers Failure IS Your Opportunity

PRES. BENJAMIN HARRISON SAID:
Dr. Ridpath's labors are deserving of the highest praise. I most heartily recommend his History of the World for study and for convenient reference.

S. C. BARTLETT, President Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H., said:
It is a popular history of wide range, and brought down from the most ancient to the most modern times. The style is clear, the narrative well balanced, and the statements reliable. The worth of such a work to every young man or woman, or in a family of children, is beyond calculation.

The Christian Herald, in reviewing this great publication, said in part: "Ridpath's History of the World may be regarded as a complete library in itself. No other work of its kind has ever supplied a History so well suited to the needs of all classes and conditions of men. We mark the marvelous influence of Christianity upon the world's progress. He would be a blind reader of history indeed who did not discern, throughout all, the influence of a great Omnipotent hand, guiding and developing all things. We cheerfully commend this most popular and complete of all world histories to our readers. These nine handsomely bound volumes will make the very best nucleus for a family library, and will be a potent educator of the young and a mine of valuable information for readers of all ages."

RIDPATH'S enviable position as an historian is due to his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman Senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that thin line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt.

RIDPATH in your home means you need never spend a lonely evening. You can associate with the world's heroes; you can cross the Rubicon with Caesar, after which Rome was free no more. You can sit at the feet of Socrates, the loftiest genius of the ancient world. You can walk with Luther, who did more than any other man to give to the world religious freedom. You can kneel at the shrine of Lincoln, "the greatest human of all time, the gentlest memory of our world." It is ennobling to commune with these children of destiny. To be associated with great men and events is to be great one's self, and you will add to your store of knowledge which is power, and to the richness of your life.

SEND COUPON TO-DAY!

FATHERS! Qualify your boys and girls for the great battle of life. The progressive citizen takes pride in his home and fireside, but sometimes neglects that which means more to him than all the world besides—the education of his boy or girl. It is admitted the best foundation of an education is to acquire the habit of reading good books. Next to the Bible, Ridpath's History of the World is the most valuable work you can place in your home. It will acquaint your children with the great facts of history and give them the habit of reading that which is true and ennobling instead of dime novels and trashy literature. The day must come in the course of events when the chairs of your boy or girl will be empty by your fireside, and they will be out struggling alone in the world. Equip them now for this struggle. It will repay you a thousandfold.

MOTHERS! You know, as all the world knows, that the success in life of your boys and girls is heaven to you. There is little else in the world worth living for. "Give your boys and girls a chance!" Give them an education which will fit them for the stern realities of life. Teach them to love home by making the home so attractive that it is worth loving. Place in your home good, interesting, truthful books for your children. In this day and age of fierce competition it is little short of a misfortune for any boy or girl to grow up without the equipment of a good education, and especially a knowledge of history. In the words of Lincoln, in his address to his old friends and neighbors at Springfield, Ill., just before starting for Washington to assume the office of President of the United States: "Neighbors, give your boys and girls a chance!" Let Ridpath teach them history.

WALDENSIAN EVANGELICAL CHURCH COMMITTEE OF EVANGELIZATION

REV. V. ALBERTO COSTABEL
Delegate to the Evangelical Churches of North America

MY DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: As the representative in America of the Waldensian Church of Italy, I beg to tell you, in its name and in my own, how deeply grateful we are to you and the subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the most generous and welcome gift of FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS which, thanks to your readers' very kind interest in our behalf, has been cabled through the State Department to Rev. Arturo Muston, President of our Missionary Board, Rome, Italy, to be used for the relief of our stricken Evangelical brethren of Sicily.

Having been for six years the pastor of the Waldensian community at Messina, I feel deeply grateful towards you and all good Christian people who have done so much to alleviate the sufferings of the destitute remnant of my former congregation. It is a cause of great comfort and joy to me to have the privilege of sending you their thanks for the new hope such Christian sympathy and magnificent liberality have caused to shine upon their blighted lives. With most respectful regards, yours very gratefully,

V. ALBERTO COSTABEL.

And several hundred others to be acknowledged next week.

Mr. and Mrs. Taft Leaving the Presidencia, Panama

President Obaldia and Mr. Taft

The Canal Engineers Who Aided in the Inspection

PRESIDENT-ELECT TAFT'S PANAMA TRIP

MR. TAFT has now returned from his tour of inspection of the Panama Canal. It was a short trip, representing only a few days' actual investigation of the work on the Canal Zone, but, with characteristic energy, the President-elect crowded a great deal into the time at his disposal and made the visit a very thorough and satisfactory one.

Two armored cruisers, bearing Mr. Taft and his party of engineers, arrived off Colon, via Galveston, on Friday, February 5, at 10 A.M. By noon the visitors were ashore and off by special train for Culebra. He desired to inspect every phase of the work of construction and particularly to observe those features that are the vital factors in the lock system.

First he saw Gatun dam, concerning which there has been so much controversy. The actual dam construction is not far advanced, but the army engineers asserted that the recent sinking is not permanent. The permanent stone toes of the dam are not yet constructed, the present ones being merely a stone revetment built to receive the small quantity of excavated debris pumped in. The dam was built over the vent of the old French channel, and so sunk under its own weight. The engineers claimed that the sinking had nothing to do with the permanent dam structure.

Mr. Taft next saw the Chagres River, which had risen twenty-two feet because of a heavy rainfall. It displayed a whirling force which the projected Gatun dam must resist. A sheet of piling is being driven along the base of the proposed dam for reinforcement.

At Culebra he was greeted by a group of Panama officials, whom he briefly addressed, expressing his gratification that the treaty between the United States, Panama and Colombia had been ratified by the Panama Congress. He hoped to meet President Obaldia, and did meet him later.

It is said that Mr. Taft's suggestion for night work on the canal will be adopted, with a view to hastening its completion. It is believed that it will be entirely practicable to work by electric light. The only possible drawback will be the difficulty of suppressing the mosquitoes, which are most active at night and are liable to spread fever. Dr. Gorgas, the sanitary expert, and his assistants, are making experiments and may be able to overcome this difficulty.

During the next few days the President-elect was a very busy man. In company with Colonel Goethals and the other engineers, he visited every point of interest along the line of canal operations from Colon to Panama. He put many questions and insisted upon seeing for himself all that was to be seen. Nothing seemed to escape his notice. His familiarity with the whole canal problem astonished the engineers themselves, who, while not averse to so sharp an investigation, had not expected it.

His questions frequently led into the most minute details and to many close calculations as to the quantities of earth excavated and yet to be excavated, the time and the cost. The Gatun dam received the closest attention, and every inquiry, however searching, was frankly met by the engineers.

Mr. and Mrs. Taft Greeting the Panama Delegation at Culebra

When Mr. Taft and his party reached Colon, on the return trip from Panama, Governor Melendez and a large group of Panama Railroad and Canal Commission officials and employees assembled at the dock to give him farewell. The President-elect was in a cheerful mood. He said he had visited and inspected every part of the canal, but of course he was not then prepared to discuss the result of his trip. He considered that the work, as a whole, was making satisfactory progress. It was evident that all hands were doing their best to get it through at the earliest possible date. He expected later to have the reports of those engineers who inspected the works with him, as to the type of the canal and also as to the continuance of the present plans.

The party then embarked on the North Carolina at Colon for the return trip. Colonel Goethals, chief engineer of the canal, accompanied Mr. Taft. He expects to be called before the Appropriation Committee of Congress to testify as to the amount of work done and to be done. It is understood that 62,000,000 cubic yards of earth were dug out up to February 1, and that 111,000,000 have yet to be excavated.

On the return trip the two cruisers, Montana and North Carolina, ran into a pretty severe gale in the Gulf.

That the Panama Canal is to be a leading topic in Congress for some time to come is made evident from the growing disposition to bring up for discussion the whole question of ultimate cost, as well as of the type of canal. United States Senator Kittredge's statement in the Senate lately that it will cost $400,000,000 to complete the canal on the lock-type plan now being pursued, instead of $135,000,000, is thought to have more significance than lies on the surface. Senator Kittredge is chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. He expressed the belief that a sea level canal could be built for $247,000,000. He pointed out the huge expenditures already necessitated by working under the lock plan and intimated that the future outlay may be equally heavy. This statement he made apropos of the proposition to

The Lifeful Look

TEXT—Isa. 45 : 22

PERHAPS it is permissible to imagine that part of the employment of the redeemed in heaven is the repetition of the texts of Scripture which led to their conversion. One can well suppose that such an exercise would greatly honor God's word, magnify God's grace, and still more fully celestialize the spirits of the redeemed. Such an exercise would be greatly profitable to the saints of God during their earthly pilgrimage; we can, therefore, understand how ennobling and divinizing such an experience would be on the part of the saints in glory. Augustine, the famous bishop of Hippo, the greatest of the Latin Fathers, and one of the most eminent doctors of the Western Church, would recite Romans 13:13, and in the recitation he would be reminded of the most crucial and, at the same time, the most blessed experience of his remarkable career. Martin Luther, the heroic reformer, would recite with holy joy the words, "The just shall live by faith." In the recitation, he would be reminded of his visit to Rome, of his climbing on his knees the staircase of Pilate, the santa scala, and of his consuming desire to find peace with God by the performance of various penances. The light flashed upon his soul with the incoming of this passage of Scripture. That was the turning point in his heroic career, and one of the blessed moments in the history of the Protestant Reformation throughout the world. Oliver Cromwell, the greatest man whom England has yet produced, would be reminded of his thrilling experience when the bullet, which might have pierced his heart, was stopped by the Bible in his pocket, the bullet resting on the words, "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." That was, indeed, a thrilling moment in the experience of him who afterward became Lord Protector of England, and a stronghold of Puritanism in England, and of Protestantism throughout the world. Brave and immortal John Bunyan would recite the passage, "And yet there is room." That was the Scripture which brought hope, joy and peace to his troubled soul. He had long felt that he was too great a sinner to receive God's forgiveness, and to enjoy the blessing of assured salvation. Light from the reconciled face of Jesus Christ came to him through these words in the parable of our Lord.

Looking to Christ

Perhaps, however, among all the saints in glory, there is no one who would repeat with more ecstatic bliss the text which God made the means of his conversion than would Charles Haddon Spurgeon. On Sunday morning, January 6, 1856, at New Park Street Chapel, Southwark, London, Mr. Spurgeon preached on the words chosen as the text this morning, "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else." Standing before his great audience, he said: "Six years ago to-day, as near as possible at this very hour of the day, I was 'in the gall of bitterness, and in the bonds of iniquity,' but had yet, by divine grace, been led to feel the bitterness of that bondage, and to cry out by reason of the soreness f its slavery." He then proceeded to tell his audience that he did not go with his father to the usual place of worship, but as the morning was very snowy, he heeded the advice of his mother and went to the chapel of the Primitive Methodists. For a time, no minister came; then a tall and slender man entered the pulpit, and announced as his text the words already quoted. Setting his eyes upon Mr. Spurgeon, he said, in tones of thunder, "Young man, you are in trouble; you will never get out of it, unless you look to Christ!" He then lifted up his hands and cried out, as Mr. Spurgeon suggestively says, as only a Primitive Methodist can, "Look! Look!" At once Mr. Spurgeon looked to Jesus as his personal Saviour. His heart leaped with joy at that moment. He had been waiting to do many things, with the hope that, by so doing, he might experience divine forgiveness and spiritual joy; but the moment he looked to Jesus he found life in the look. He tells us himself that he could almost have looked his eyes away, and that in heaven he will look on Jesus still with joy unutterable. That snowy day was the most joyous day he had ever known; it was also a day of unspeakable blessing to the whole world. That day the greatest preacher since the days of the Apostle Paul experienced the joy of the new life, and entered upon his unique career as the foremost preacher of his time and of the centuries.

The Thought of the Prophet

The words come to us to-day with great power and with corresponding sweetness. One can well imagine Mr. Spurgeon greeting the prophet Isaiah in heaven with gratitude and joy, because of the words spoken by Isaiah and owned of God to the conversion of Mr. Spurgeon. That unknown Primitive Methodist preacher will wear a crown resplendent with stars; perhaps to Isaiah, under God, will largely belong the honors won, through divine grace, by Mr. Spurgeon in the salvation of tens of thousands in many lands. As we read the words of the text, the picture of the old prophet, who, according to tradition, was sawn asunder during the reign of Manasseh, rises before us resistless in power and radiant in glory. He has appropriately been called the evangelical prophet, and his prophecy the fifth Gospel. Gloriously does he tell us of Christ's wondrous birth, beneficent life, atoning death and triumphant and everlasting kingdom. The simplicity, sweetness and sublimity of his writings show that he was also a man of fine feeling, poetic genius and spiritual fervor. As one turned away from Jerusalem to London, and listened to Mr. Spurgeon, he could, but by a slight stretch of the imagination, conceive of the noble prophet as restored to life, and standing in the midst of the modern Babylon, delivering his earnest rebukes, his stirring appeals and his sublime exhortations. Let us catch the thought of the evangelical prophet, as expressed in the text chosen for the morning, the text so wonderfully owned of God in the conversion of Mr. Spurgeon, that it has really become a Bible classic, and will ever hereafter be associated with Mr. Spurgeon's honored and immortal name.

This command, "Look unto Me," arrests our attention and demands our prompt obedience. It is not really optional with us whether or not we shall obey this command, except that all obedience is optional, our destiny depending, however, upon the option we shall make. This command rests on a firm foundation; it carries us back to what is said of God in the preceding verse, "A just God and a Saviour." These two facts are placed before us without the implication of contradiction in the twofold statement. God is just and true in the salvation of his people; he keeps all his promises in securing their salvation. In the cross of Christ God showed himself just, and at the same time divinely merciful. In that cross he represented his utter abhorrence of sin, and yet showed his determination to make the pardon of sin possible. In the cross, the beautiful languge of the psalmist has its perfect illustration:

> Mercy and Truth are met together,
> Righteousness and Peace have kissed each other.

The same idea the Apostle Paul expresses in writing to the Romans, when he affirms of God, "That he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." It is God's highest glory that he can be, at the same time, both just and merciful; that he can preserve the honor of his law, and yet pardon repentant sinners. Human governments that constantly exercise mercy become impotent and almost contemptible. Law unassociated with penalty ceases to be law, and becomes only advice. No human administration can constantly exercise mercy and preserve the honor and dignity of the law. But what is impossible among men is possible with God; he preserves the honor of his law, and, at the same time, grants forgiveness of sin to the utmost degree. It is a marvelous conception of God, this union of justice and mercy in the same being, each supplementing and honoring the other, and both revealing God in the fulness, blessedness and divineness of his holy nature.

This command shows the perfect simplicity of salvation—"Look unto me." We must, of course, understand that the word look has in it the idea of turning unto God. It is almost equivalent to saying, "Be converted, turn unto the Lord your God." It is here clearly implied that all men can turn unto God. We are to look to Jesus with the eye of faith. This is a look to him as the only Saviour; it is a look that is earnest, humble, hopeful and trustful. We are to gaze upon him with the eye of the soul; that we can so look, and find mercy by looking, is no dream of the quietist and no mere meditation of the mystic. It is a blessed experience of the most practical and rational men who have looked with the eye of faith to God, and have experienced life in that look. We are to look exclusively to God in Jesus Christ; none but God can forgive sin. This command humbles all sinners, and most earnestly rebukes all unbelievers. It takes from them their pride, by robbing them of self-righteousness, as a ground of acceptance with God. Men constantly tell us that they cannot accept Christ, because they have not sufficiently repented. Such men are to be reminded that here they are simply commanded to look. We must also remember that this is a look to Christ in his personal character. We are not to look to rites and ceremonies, not to ordinances and sacraments, not to our own goodness or badness; we are to look away from all these things, and lovingly fix the eye of faith upon our divine Lord and Saviour. We may look to him as on the cross of Calvary he dies for our sins; and we are to look to him as on the throne of heaven he makes intercession for our sins.

What is Salvation?

We are sometimes told by seekers after Christ that they cannot see him. Mr. Spurgeon, in the sermon to which I have already referred, reminds us that we are not commanded to see him, but only to look. Behold the simplicity of the way of salvation! We have here a command, which, in English, consists of only four letters, and two of them are alike. How different God's method of salvation is from that of sacramentarians and ritualists! We are commanded to set aside all reference to rites and ceremonies, and at once look to Jesus, as the dying Israelites who had been bitten by the serpents turned their eyes toward the brazen serpent. Thus, looking by faith, they lived through the power of God, symbolized by the serpent of brass exalted in obedience to the divine command. As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so was Jesus Christ lifted up upon the cross. We are to look to him as the trustful patient looks to the skilful physician, as the drowning man to his deliverer; so looking, turning aside from all human means of salvation, we shall experience the unspeakable bliss of joy and peace by believing in Jesus Christ.

What is salvation? There is no sweeter word, in any language, than the word salvation. All men are really seeking salvation in some form. Not all are conscious of the nature of their need, nor of the right source by which that need can be supplied. Men and women all about us are hungry and thirsty, and are striving to satisfy their hunger and their thirst by the things of this life. They need the bread of heaven and the water of life; until they receive these gifts of God, their immortal natures will never know true spiritual peace and joy. Only God can satisfy a human soul. There is an affecting story told of Heinrich Heine, the greatest lyric poet of modern Germany; he was called by Matthew Arnold the continuator of Goethe. He was prematurely disabled by disease, and was utterly weary in body and mind and heart. Going into the Louvre in Paris, he saw the famous statue of Venus of Milo; this is the remarkable statue representing the bewitching goddess of pleasure in the very perfection of physical beauty and charm. It is well known that this statue has lost both its arms, although it still preserves much of its enchanting beauty. No one who has ever seen this statue can forget his first view thereof, as he wandered through the hall of which it is one of the chief adornments. At the feet of this statue, Heine cast himself in utter despair and hopeless remorse. He said of the experience: "There I lay a long time, and wept so passionately that a stone must have had compassion on me. The goddess looked down compassionately upon me, but she was helpless to console me. She looked as if she would say, 'See you not that I have no arms and that, therefore, I can give you no help?'" This is a description of unspeakable pathos. The armless goddess could not help the despairing poet. All the

THE CHURCH AND THE WORKINGMAN

Rev. Frank M. North, New York

Rev. Ward Platt, Philadelphia

Dr. E. A. Steiner, Iowa College

Rev. Charles Stelzle, Evangelist

Rev. H. L. Morehouse

PITTSBURG, Pa., has just witnessed a great interdenominational campaign in behalf of home missions. This is one of the results of the federation of the churches. The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America stands behind this great movement. Seventeen denominations have united in forming a Home Missions Council, and this Council has inaugurated a publicity campaign in fifteen large cities in the interest of Home Missions and National Evangelization.

Pittsburg was one of the fifteen favored cities in this itinerary, and on Sunday, January 31, and Monday, February 1, there were held meetings of unusual interest and enthusiasm. There were three union meetings on Sunday afternoon, six interdenominational meetings on Sunday evening, and seven or eight great rallies and mass meetings on Monday. The speakers admitted that Pittsburg had so far outstripped all the other cities visited in the attendance and enthusiasm. There were great addresses on great subjects by eminent speakers, and by leading experts and specialists from different denominations. To show the denominations interested, it is interesting to report that meetings were held in the following churches: The First Presbyterian Church, of Wilkinsburg; the First Baptist Church, of Homestead; the Walton Methodist Episcopal Church, of the South Side; the First Presbyterian Church, North Side; the Sixth United Presbyterian, East Liberty; the Calvary Protestant Episcopal Church, Christ's Methodist Episcopal Church, Bellefield Presbyterian Church and the Fourth Avenue Baptist Church. The Pittsburg committee having charge of the meetings consisted of thirty-five ministers and laymen, representing many denominations.

Dr. Henry L. Morehouse, of New York City, corresponding secretary of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, spoke in the First Presbyterian Church of Wilkinsburg on "To-day's Outstanding Problems of Home Missions." Rev. Reese T. Alsop, D.D., spoke at the same time and place on "A Christianized America for World Redemption." At the First Baptist Church, in Homestead, Rev. H. C. Herring, D.D., spoke on "Home Mission Obligations," and Professor E. A. Steiner, Ph.D., spoke on "The Immigrating and the Emigrating Peoples." At the Bellevue Methodist Episcopal Church Rev. A. W. Fortune, D.D., spoke on "Denominational Co-operation," and Rev. John E. White, D.D., spoke on "The Backward Peoples."

Other speakers in the other churches spoke on the following topics: Rev. W. S. Holt, D.D., spoke on "Work in the Far West," and Professor E. A. Steiner, Ph.D., spoke on "The Immigrants," in the Calvary Protestant Episcopal Church. Rev. H. L. Grose, D.D., spoke on "Our Newly Arrived Citizens"; Rev. Frank Mason North, LL.D., spoke on "City Evangelization," and Rev. F. W. Wright delivered an address on "Christian Work Among Foreigners in America." All these subjects were treated by experts in a very strong and convincing manner. Very seldom does any city hear in two days so many able specialists on Home Missions and Evangelization. Here were many of the picked men of many of the large denominations, and all spoke on the same high level and with the same beautiful spirit of Christian unity. The meeting on Monday, at 10 A.M., in the Fourth Avenue Baptist Church, was one of the most remarkable sessions of the series. All the Ministerial Unions in the city united, filling the great auditorium with many hundreds of ministers of all denominations. The public was invited, and it was a gathering of profound spiritual interest. The speakers were Rev. Ward Platt, on "The Frontiers of Our Country," and Dr. H. L. Morehouse on "Home Mission Visions"; Professor E. A. Steiner, Ph.D., on "The Ministry to the Immigrant," and Rev. Charles Stelzle on "The Workingman and the Church."

The ministers and laymen were deeply moved by these powerful addresses. Mr. Stelzle made a stirring appeal to the ministers to give more attention to workingmen. He knows all about the labor question at first hand, for he entered the ranks of labor when only eight years old. He worked in a sweatshop in New York. His mother tried to keep him and his sisters from starvation by working for a sweatshop, making wrappers for two dollars per dozen. Later he became a newsboy and then a mechanic. When he grew up he became a member of the International Association of Machinists. Mr. Stelzle stirred the greatest enthusiasm with these startling words, "There is so much religion in the labor movement, and so much social spirit in the Church, that some day it will become a question as to whether the Church will capture the labor movement, or whether the labor movement will capture the Church. There are four fundamental facts in this connection: First, working people almost universally honor Jesus Christ as their friend and leader, and most of them believe in his divinity. Second, working people are naturally religious, even though their religion is not always expressed in the accepted orthodox manner. Third, the labor question is fundamentally a moral and religious problem. History has prophesied it. Our best labor leaders are coming to recognize it. Present reform measures, which workingmen are hearing about to-day, indicate it. Fourth, there has rarely been a time in the history of the labor movement when working people have responded more readily to the appeal of the Church than to-day. For these reasons, then, the Church is already supreme in the matter of capturing the labor movement for Christ."

idols of man's imagination, and all the means of salvation of man's discovery, are statues without arms. They cannot enfold one poor lost soul to the throbbing heart of pity and love. We need a Saviour who has arms and who has a heart; we need a Saviour with the tenderness of a mother and the almightiness of God. In Jesus Christ we have both; in him, and in him alone, can full salvation be found.

Salvation implies deliverance from the punishment of sin, because it is, at the first, deliverance from the practice and power of sin. Jesus saves us, not in our sins, but from our sins. The very name "Jesus" was given him because he was to be the Saviour of sinners. Salvation, at the last, results from salvation experienced here and now. Heaven is the natural outcome of divine grace in the heart while we are upon earth. No man will enter heaven there and then, into whose heart heaven has not entered here and now.

We are aware that the ancients were accustomed to conceive of the earth as a vast plain, having well-defined boundaries. This conception of the physical universe gives the form of expression found in this text. This invitation is to be extended literally to the remotest parts of the world. The offer of the Gospel is universal; all are invited to embrace salvation, and be saved in harmony with God's boundless love. Nothing is more certain than that God is both willing and able to save all who will believe in Jesus Christ. There is no passage of Scripture, and no decree of the Almighty, that limits salvation, if men will only accept the divine invitation.

Another meaning, however, may be well attached to the phrase, "the ends of the earth"; it may include properly sinners of every degree of human guilt. Preaching on one occasion, Whitefield affirmed that Christ was willing to receive even the "devil's castaways." He was the guest of Lady Huntingdon at the close of the sermon. At the table, with a tone of slight rebuke, she questioned the wisdom of the language which he had employed; just then a rap upon the door was heard; two women were admitted. They asked for Mr. Whitefield, and, upon meeting him, they declared that they belonged to the class described as the "devil's castaways," and had long given up all hope of receiving divine forgiveness, but that his words had given them courage to hope for mercy. They knelt before God, confessing their manifold sins; and they went away rejoicing in forgiveness, having found life for a look at the crucified One.

There is here a good reason given why men should look to God and be saved. Against him we have sinned; as compared with our sins against our fellow-men, each must say of his sins against God, "Against thee, thee only, have I sinned and done this evil in thy sight." When our sin is reduced to its last analysis, it will be found to be, in its most heinous elements, sin against God. He alone can forgive our sin; and to him alone, therefore, we must look for that forgiveness. Christ said, "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." Christ has been lifted up upon the cross as the divine sacrifice for human sin. We may now look to God through Christ with the full assurance of receiving forgiveness for our sins, however numerous and heinous they may be. God can now be just, and yet the justifier of those who believe in Jesus Christ.

We are to look to God, because he alone can save. No priest can forgive sin, except the great High Priest who sits upon the mediatorial throne. No idol, no man, no angel can save us from the inevitable consequences of unforgiven sin. If, therefore, any man is to be saved, he must come to God in his appointed way, and receive salvation as God's gracious gift. This text teaches us that God will save men of all ages, nations, climes and degrees of guilt, if only they seek mercy through Christ as the divine-human Saviour.

This sermon closes, as it began, by emphasizing the divine command, "Look unto me." It is impossible to overstate the importance of this command, and the blessedness of prompt and perfect obedience to the same. The terms of salvation are so simple as to antagonize men who wish, by acts of penance and righteousness, to win salvation rather than to receive it as God's free gift. Immediately some men turn away, as did Naaman when told that his leprosy might be cured by baptizing himself seven times in the Jordan. The folly of such men is unspeakably great; they reject God's divinest blessings and expose themselves to God's righteous indignation. We ought to look to God for salvation. If we reject God, there is none other in the universe who can forgive sin and renew the heart by divine grace. Look to him and be saved now. Do not ask that you shall see him; you are simply commanded to look and to live. You may go out of this house to-day redeemed by God's infinite grace and ineffable love. Think once more of that self-condemned young man who sat, on the snowy Sunday morning, in the corner of the humble chapel, and who then and there looked to Jesus Christ and was graciously saved. Why may not you follow his example, and receive the same blessed salvation? I hold before you once more Jesus Christ, who was lifted up on the cross as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness. O men and women, look and live just now, and learn the alphabet of a blessed experience, whose fulness even eternity cannot exhaust, as you tell that you found life abundant, ecstatic and eternal simply by a trustful, personal, loving look at the crucified One.

MEDICAL MISSIONARY CONVENTION

AN Interdenominational Medical Missionary Conference, lasting three days, and the first of its kind ever held in the country, met at Battle Creek Sanitarium from the 19th to the 21st of January, inclusive. It was in many respects a most remarkable and unique gathering. The president, Bishop Thoburn (India, 1859), and the two vice-presidents, Rev. Dr. J. B. Hartwell (China, 1858), and Rev. R. H. Nassau, M.D., D.D. (West Africa, 1861), represented a total of a century and a half of service. These three men, Methodist, Baptist and Presbyterian, respectively, from their three fields of labor were thus brought together as never before, and each came over a thousand miles to attend the Conference. In addition, there were more than fifty missionaries present, representing thirteen denominations, including Baptists, Congregationalists, Methodists and Presbyterians, and twelve mission fields.

On the opening day there was a somewhat pathetic session, devoted largely to the memory of departed medical missionary heroes. Bishop Thoburn's wife, who died in 1902, was a medical missionary, and on one side of him sat the widow of Dr. J. L. Phillips, of India, while on the other side sat the widow of Dr. Moses P. Parmelee, medical missionary in Turkey. Relatives of others were also present. Dr. Dowkontt, the secretary, read the roll call, comprising nearly one hundred names, and including those of Dr. John Scudder and Dr. Jacob Chamberlain, of India; Dr. Peter Parker and Dr. John G. Kerr, of China; and, from Great Britain, Dr. David Livingstone, of Africa; Dr. Hudson Taylor, of China, and Dr. John Thomas, who, after seven years spent in India alone, took back with him the famous William Carey, in 1793. Some of those still living, but not present, were honored by a place among the officers, the honorary president being Dr. James C. Hepburn, who went to China in 1841 and to Japan in 1859, and who is now in his ninety-fourth year. As honorary vice-presidents were Dr. Clara A. Swain, the first woman medical missionary to go from America to a heathen land, having gone to India in 1870. To these two, who are now retired and in the home land, special letters of loving esteem for "their work's sake" were sent. Others named as honorary vice-presidents were: Dr. Post, of Syria, 1859; Dr. L. B. Salmans, Mexico, 1880; Dr. R. C. Beebe, China, 1884, and Dr. L. R. Scudder, India, 1888.

A Group of the Medical Missionaries Present at the Conference

At the final meeting resolutions were passed favoring a thorough training of medical missionaries, and their ample equipment by the board under which they are sent out; also that courses of health study should be organized, to call the attention of the mission workers to the importance of giving attention to their own physical needs. A resolution was presented by Dr. J. H. McCartney, of the Methodist Mission in China, and adopted, recommending the work being done by the American Medical Missionary College to the favorable consideration and co-operation of the various Missionary Boards. Also a resolution of gratitude and appreciation to Dr. Kellogg, the Board of Managers and the entire medical staff of the Battle Creek institution, for courtesies in connection with the Conference, and a vote of thanks to Dr. Dowkontt for his "untiring and loving interest."

A letter addressed to "Medical Missionaries Throughout the World" was approved, in which it was set forth that "the present gathering of so large a body of medical and other missionaries at this first Conference affords striking evidence also of advance along the line, in behalf of medical missions; and, while no invidious distinction or comparison is entertained regarding other forms of Christian effort, the great and crying need of medical aid for the suffering millions in many lands, and its value in so many ways in missionary effort, must cause rejoicing at every advanced effort put forth in the furtherance of this Christlike agency. Hence, we extend to you, who are still laboring in the fields where some of us have labored, not only our heartiest greetings and good wishes, but desire to encourage you in your efforts with the knowledge of the advanced development that has been made in the homeland to send you help and helpers as doctors and nurses."

THE INTERNATIONAL ANTI-OPIUM CONFERENCE

THE Anti-Opium Conference of Nations, which assembled in Shanghai February 1, is the first conference of the kind that has ever met in Asia. The powers represented are Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Italy, Holland, Portugal, Persia, Siam, China, Japan and the United States. Since the calling of the conference, every one of these nations, except the United States, has enacted some measure of anti-opium reform. Bishop C. H. Brent, of Manila, who suggested the conference to President Roosevelt, is chairman of the American official delegates.

In 1840-42 occurred the first of three opium wars. China had previously prohibited the sale and use of opium, except for medicine. Vigorous enforcement of this prohibition against British smugglers, if not the only cause of this war, was its chief cause. Even in abject defeat, the Chinese Emperor, Tao Kwang, nobly refused the suggestion that, as he was not permitted to exclude opium, he should license it. He said: "I cannot receive any revenue from that which causes misery and suffering to my people." It took two more opium wars, in 1858 and 1861, to establish a license system for opium in China. Then it was successfully argued that, as China was compelled to receive foreign opium, the government should tolerate native poppy farming, that by cheaper native opium they might drive out foreign opium, after which it would be possible to suppress it altogether. In 1874, the protest of the British people against the treaty compulsion put on China to tolerate opium took an organized form in the Society for the Suppression of the Opium Trade, whose first president was Lord Shaftsbury. This society has ever since agitated for the abrogation of the opium treaties. There was no official victory anywhere in the British empire until, twenty years later, in 1901, progressive New Zealand banished opium, followed in 1904 by Australia and South Africa, and in 1908 by Canada. These acts of British colonies were influential with the home government, and so also were the anti-opium reforms in the United States. In 1900 the International Reform Bureau began an anti-opium crusade. Thirty-three American missionary societies, and the Merchants' Association of New York, the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburg, the Boards of Trade of Baltimore and Jacksonville, the Endeavor Society, the W. C. T. U., and other reform bodies co-operated in securing official action by President Roosevelt, through whom an opium monopoly, projected by the Philippine government, was overruled. In 1906 American sentiment had an influential part in securing the unanimous vote of the British Parliament that the "morally indefensible Indo-Chinese opium trade should be brought to a speedy close."

Preparing a Bonfire of Opium Pipes at Shanghai

That vote, and yet more the statement of Right Hon. John Morley, Secretary of State for India, that "if China really desired to suppress the opium vice, His Majesty's government would interpose no obstacle," led China to decree the early closing of opium dens and the gradual suppression of native poppy farming. The sincerity of the efforts of the Chinese government and people in this crusade has been proclaimed in many public bonfires of costly opium pipes; but the difficulties of eradicating the opium vice, not only in China, but wherever the Chinese live, including the Philippines, where opium prohibition, decreed by Congress in 1905, went into full effect in 1908, led Bishop Brent, of Manila (who had been put on an official opium commission in 1903, in consequence of the veto of the opium monopoly), to suggest in 1907 to President Roosevelt that all nations concerned should co-operate by such a commission as is now in session at Shanghai.

The British Anti-Opium Federation and the International Reform Bureau have memorialized all the governments participating, and have sent the leading philanthropists of those nations many anti-opium books and documents. The Reform Bureau has sent to Shanghai as its representative its secretary for China, Rev. E. W. Thwing, formerly a missionary teacher in that country.

The chief obstacle to China's success in the great task that the government and people have earnestly undertaken is thus stated in a recent letter of Sir John Jordan, British Ambassador at Peking:

"Whether China can completely obtain the goal she seeks without government control of opium, both native grown and imported, is somewhat doubtful. At present she is debarred from doing so by Article V. of the British Treaty of Nanking of 1842. . . . Both in former years and since the issue of the edict, attempts have been made, both in the direction of interfering with the importation of foreign opium and the establishment of official monopolies, and successfully opposed by Great Britain as contrary to treaty stipulations. . . . Although China can deal with native-grown opium as she wishes, wherever the interests of British opium merchants have been affected by these monopolies, complaints have been made and they have in consequence been abandoned."

Secretary Hay, when the present anti-opium war was begun, and at a hearing before the State Department, gave utterance to the memorable remark that "the most influential anti-opium factor to be invoked is another appeal to a decent regard for the opinions of mankind."

IN WASHINGTON'S OFFICIAL CIRCLE

Miss Helen Taft
Daughter of the President-Elect

Mrs. P. C. Knox
Wife of Senator Knox

Viscountess de Martel
Wife of Secretary of French Embassy

Countess Moltke
Wife of Danish Minister

Mrs. T. H. Newberry
Wife of Secretary of the Navy

Countess Von Bernstorf
Wife of German Ambassador

THERE is always more or less shifting of the people who are prominent in the official and social life at Washington. Ambassadors and Ministers come and go, the States elect new Senators, who come with their wives and daughters, to enter that charmed circle which has spurred the ambition of many a promising statesman and his wife. The present winter and coming spring will see more changes than usual on account of those who are leaving with the close of the outgoing administration and entering with the coming of the new. Several important transfers have occurred within a month or two in the membership of the diplomatic corps, and others are reported by Dame Rumor to be scheduled for the near future.

Hon. P. C. Knox
Incoming Secretary of State

President-elect Taft has spent so much of his time in Washington that the entire Taft family seem like old residents. They will merely move from the house they occupied during Mr. Taft's service as Secretary of War to the White House. Miss Taft, now in college, is just at the age when she will most enjoy the social life open to the daughter of a President. She is fond of books and music, as well as of society, and stands well in her college classes. She is familiar with Washington official society and will be an invaluable aid to her mother in the exacting duties which fall to the mistress of the White House. One of Mr. Taft's sons is a student at Yale and he will do much toward enlivening things during the holidays in their new home.

Vice-President Sherman and Mrs. Sherman are probably more at home in Washington than anywhere else, on account of Mr. Sherman's long service in Congress, representing the Utica (N. Y.) district. They have several sons, one of them an assistant professor of mathematics in Hamilton College, New York, which is the alma mater of Vice-President Sherman as well as the son.

There will be quite a number of important changes in the cabinet. Senator Knox of Pennsylvania is to hold the first position, as Secretary of State. His place, socially as well as politically, is most important, as he has much to do with entertaining the diplomatic corps, with which he has so much business of state to transact. To them the United States is the Secretary of State.

Mrs. Knox gives the most elaborate entertainments in Washington, and her new home is most admirably fitted to receive the large number of distinguished people who flock to her receptions. It not only would be called a mansion, but a palace. Beautiful marbles, rosewoods and works of art adorn its interior. Probably no Secretary of State in Europe has a finer home in a capital city. Mrs. Knox was Miss Lillie Smith, daughter of Andrew D. Smith, of Pittsburg. In the summer the Knox family make their home at a large, rambling country house, built on part of the site of the historic camp of Washington at Valley Forge. Before Mr. Knox was elected Senator he served the country as Attorney-General from 1901 to 1904. Both he and his wife are as much at home in Washington as in Pittsburg, where they have their residence.

Another addition to social life in the cabinet set of the city is Hon. Truman H. Newberry, of Detroit, the new Secretary of the Navy, and his wife. They will undoubtedly take a prominent part in the life of Washington. Mr. Newberry held the post of Assistant Secretary of the Navy before his recent promotion, so that while he is no stranger to the city his wife is a valuable acquisition to the circle of cabinet ladies, in whose hands lies the management of so many interesting social events. She was formerly Miss Harriet Josephine Barnes, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and married Mr. Newberry in 1888, two years after he graduated from Yale and when he was already becoming a factor in the business life of Detroit as president of a steel company and superintendent of construction on a railway. They have a daughter, who has taken a semi-official part in naval functions by acting as sponsor at the launching of one of Uncle Sam's warships, a most coveted distinction.

Count von Bernstorf, the new German Ambassador, the Countess, and their charming and accomplished daughter, have already made a favorable impression in Washington. The position of the Kaiser's representative in Washington has been one of growing importance, as the Kaiser is doing all possible to show his friendly feeling to America. It is an interesting fact that both the present German Ambassador and his predecessor married American wives. Count Speck von Sternberg, who died a short time ago, married the beautiful Miss Langham, of Kentucky. Count von Bernstorf's wife was formerly a Miss Mayer, of New York City. She is of German descent, however. The daughter of the household, like so many of her race, is very fond of music and is quite noted as a linguist. She is unusually handsome, and will be one of the many young women who, with Miss Taft, will make a notable impression during the coming administration. When the ambassador first landed at New York he was met by a number of reporters who at once asked him what impressed him most about the country. "The high buildings," he answered, looking up at New York's towering skyline; "I never supposed there could be anything like them in the world." The Count has been in this country before, but he said that New York appeared like a new city.

Countess Moltke, the wife of the new Danish Minister, is a delightful addition to the younger matrons in the diplomatic corps. She has lived in various countries, speaks several languages practically without accent, is fond of literature and music, and possesses rare tact. Her receptions at Washington are most enjoyable and invitations to them are eagerly sought. She has said that America, to her, is a delightful country; next, in fact, to her native land.

The Viscountess de Martel, the wife of the First Secretary of the French Embassy, is another young woman who is a great help to her husband in his diplomatic career, for the post of representative at a foreign capital requires, if a man be a great success, that he have a wife who has tact and ability. In appearance she reminds one of the grand dames of the days of Louis XIV., with her stately ways and large, plumed hats, wearing gowns that have a picturesque touch, no matter what the style may be. The Viscountess is intensely interested in things musical. She not only plays and sings well herself, but gathers about her those who are accomplished musicians. She gives frequent musicales at her house, in which many of the best Washington artists, or those visiting there, are heard. She has a little daughter, to whom both parents are greatly devoted. The Viscountess can be frequently seen riding about the city or its environs with little Miss de Martel, in a large motor car. The faster they go the better they seem to like it. The mother, in fact, is a fearless motorist. Taken all in all, the capital city is becoming gradually the great social centre of the country. People from Boston and people from San Francisco like equally well to establish their winter homes there. The opportunity for seeing interesting things and meeting interesting people is unexcelled and many take the opportunity of educating their sons and daughters within sight of the stately white dome of the Capitol. New buildings of stately architecture are rising on every hand, and all Americans may well be proud of the impression that is made on visitors from all lands.

Hon. Truman H. Newberry
Secretary of the Navy

One American lady, of the bluest blood of New England, was recently visiting in Washington and was asked, on her return, what impressed her most during her stay. "It is such a real American city, such as I wish could be found wherever we have a city, East or West," she replied; and every one else who sees Washington must agree with her.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—PROFESSOR W. N. BENTLEY is conducting special evangelistic meetings at Mount Vernon, O., which are largely attended. Many conversions are reported.

—CONCERNING THE POWER of prayer, President Eliot, of Harvard, has this notable passage in his recent writings: "In those denominations which permit extemporaneous public prayer the minister possesses that tremendous means of influence. Leading in prayer worthily is the most exalted effort of the human mind. The power of such prayer is pervasive and enduring beyond all imagination. It may at any moment give to the listener a thrill which runs through all his being, and determine the quality, not only of his own life, but of many of those lives which will derive from his."

—REV. J. J. LUCAS, Presbyterian Mission, Allahabad, India, writes: "I met at Dr. Ewing's a Brahman convert, Pandit Vidiya Ananda, with his wife and little son named Judson. I asked, 'Why have you given the name Judson to your child?' The answer was, 'It was reading the Life of Judson that brought me back to Christ. I had been baptized, but forsook Christ and became an Arya preacher. It was in an Arya journal I read Judson's life, put into that journal to stir up Arya preachers to self-sacrifice with the argument that if this foreigner Judson left his home and country, and sacrificed so much to preach Christ, how much more should the Arya preacher be ready to endure for preaching the vedas to his own people.'"

—MISS REBECCA PARISH, a medical missionary in the Philippines, writes to a friend in New York: "One Sunday lately we went to a little native chapel, where the missionary was to preach. At the afternoon service Mr. Koehler had planned to celebrate the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; but when we went to the little chapel, through a driving tropic rain, we found the place all wet, and, as the chapel had no floor, there was no place to kneel to partake of the Lord's Supper. Well, these people are always resourceful, so they went and brought in two bamboo tree trunks, and, with a broad board placed across, soon had an altar improvised. My sympathies were stirred, and I am trying to figure out whether I could, from my own already over-taxed salary, squeeze out the $13 necessary to put a floor in that chapel. They really ought to have a floor. These people have embraced our faith, and they have left large churches, with richly robed and jewel-bedecked saints and idols, and they should at least have a decent place to worship."

A Great Symposium

NEXT week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be one of special interest, not only to our own large circle of readers, but to the whole country. In order to test opinion in the widest manner possible, on a topic of the greatest national importance, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD communicated with a large number of representative Americans, including men and women of distinction in every part of the Union, inviting them to answer briefly and unreservedly a single question of great national importance at the present time.

Hundreds of replies have been received from leading statesmen, Senators and Representatives in Congress, governors, admirals, generals, college professors, bishops, mayors, publicists, authors of both sexes, artists, labor leaders, and representative public men and women in every walk of life. Probably no national symposium has ever taken so wide a range, or proved so rich in variety and suggestion. Concentrated public opinion is a mighty power, and such a presentation cannot fail to exert an influence, as it brings home in the most direct way to those in power the dearest hopes and desires of the American people.

What these hopes and expectations are the letters themselves will explain to all when they appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD next week. Meanwhile, we urge all our readers to inform their friends of this coming feature, which vitally affects every American and which none should miss reading.

The President and the Farmers

RECENTLY the President made the recommendation that something practical be done to improve the lot of the farmers and make it possible for them to have many of the advantages now only open to city or suburban dwellers. A body of representative men were appointed as a Country Life Commission, and, on the receipt of their report, the President submitted it, together with a message giving his views on the subject. To get the information, thirty public hearings were held in various parts of the country, these meetings being attended not only by the farmers from over forty States, but also by that most important factor in farm life, the farmers' wives. The Department of Agriculture sent out questions broadcast, and received over one hundred and twenty thousand answers.

The reports showed that the standard of living was far above that enjoyed by agriculturists in any other land, but the President said that, notwithstanding this, "farming does not yield either the profit or the satisfaction that it ought to yield, and can be made to yield. There is discontent in the country, and in places discouragement."

The President proposes, as a remedy for all this, better farming, better business and better living on the farm. He suggests that organization would help, as would better roads, a parcels post, improved sanitation of farm buildings, and better facilities for gratifying the social aspirations of farm people.

The President's ideas are worthy the consideration of our public men, and of the farmers themselves. Rural communities are the backbone of the nation. They not only feed the rest of the country, but a large part of Europe as well. The discontent which sends young people to the cities is only natural, the desire for a change, for a new environment. It is found to a certain extent in the cities, and there has been a strong counter flow of city people back to the farm in the last few years.

The President says rightly that farming "is one of the most dignified and desirable ways of earning a living," but that "the farmer must take advantage not only of the agricultural knowledge so freely offered him, which is at his disposal, but of the methods which have raised, and continue to raise, the standards of living and intelligence in other callings."

Again the Guillotine

FRANCE has restored the guillotine, and the old instrument of execution was used recently in the decapitation of four notorious criminals, who had been guilty of taking human life. President Fallieres, carried away by the imperious popular outcry for victims to atone for the wanton crimes, is reported to have said: "If France wants blood, she shall have it!" So he signed the death warrants, and France had its horrible saturnalia.

It is an old and true saying that the "worst use to which you can put a man is to kill him." As civilization progresses, the death penalty will disappear; indeed, in several countries it has already passed into disuse. Sociologists ask whether crime is not a disease, and also to what extent society is responsible for the criminal. Moreover, experience has shown that capital punishment is not a deterrent of crime. Another very grave consideration is the fact that a wealthy and influential criminal rarely stands in danger of losing his life by the law. Recent illustrations of this fact are so numerous and so undeniable that it seems superfluous to comment on the subject.

In France to-day, where the death penalty is the problem of the hour, an eminent criminologist, describing the situation, writes that there appears to be a recrudescence of crime, which nothing but the assertion of "the supreme rights of society" can effectually meet. This is a lamentable confession of the frightful conditions to which President Fallieres has yielded. M. Clemenceau, the present French Premier, some time ago expressed the enlightened public opinion of the country regarding "administrative murders," called executions, which he termed official cowardice and savagism, the guillotine being "a kind of low vengeance." He regarded the spectacle of civilized people of good education punishing malefactors by cutting them in two, as a distinct reversion to a primitive state of barbarism unworthy of an enlightened age.

Queen Helena Sends Thanks

ROYAL ITALIAN EMBASSY

Washington, D. C., Feb. 11.

Dr. Louis Klopsch, Christian Herald, New York:

On behalf of Her Gracious Majesty Queen Helena, I have the pleasure of expressing to you and through you to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers, Her Majesty's warmest thanks for the conspicuous and generous contribution to her Fund for Mothers and Children of the Earthquake-stricken regions.

(Signed) MAYOR DES PLANCHES.

OUR Italian relief work, in which so many readers are interested, is opening up many new and wonderful vistas of charity. Among the first on the field to succor the injured after the earthquake —certainly the first from any land outside of Italy—THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers' gifts were the means of assuaging much suffering in Messina, Reggio and other centres of seismic disturbance. Later, the food-ship Bayern's cargo, half of which represented the consecrated offerings of our readers, was a timely and potent factor in the relief campaign. And now, the beautiful and Christlike work of benevolence among the poor widowed Italian mothers and their little children is one that is appealing strongly to American womanhood.

Queen Helena herself is at the head of this special work, which had its inception in the kindly heart of an American mother, who suggested it through this journal, the gentle Queen gladly accepting the responsibility and devoting herself to this most helpless class, whose helplessness makes their dependence of longer duration than that of the other sufferers.

We trust that all of our readers who have not already done so will send in their offerings to the Italian Mothers' and Babies' Fund promptly, and as liberally as their hearts may dictate, and earn not only the thanks of the good Italian Queen, but of the thousands of peasant mothers, whose sad hearts are cheered and their burden of grief made easier to bear through this beneficent American charity. Every gift will be acknowledged in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Immoral Plays

SIGNIFICANT, if not edifying, is the warfare which has unexpectedly broken out among the theatrical managers of New York on the question of immoral plays. So strong and insistent has the public protest grown in opposition to the vile productions put on the metropolitan stage by unscrupulous managers that, for very shame's sake, the president of the Theatrical Manager's Association—himself a veteran of forty years' managerial experience—has been compelled to take up the cause of the remonstrants and to admit that, if he had the power, he would close up immediately at least five New York theatres, which are at the present time presenting plays that "cater to the baser passions" and are a disgrace to the community.

We would like our friends to remember what this outspoken manager, who remorselessly criticises his own craft, has to say of the evils of the modern stage, when it is in unscrupulous hands. He declares that there is not a word of truth in the claim that questionable productions point a moral lesson. They depict life in a manner unfit for public presentation, and especially for the young. This conscience-stricken manager confesses to a fear that many children will suffer from having their morals corrupted by plays of the class referred to. The managers, he says, are going from bad to worse and trying just how far the American people will stand this infliction of the immoral drama. They have entered upon an era of dramatic indecency that has no parallel.

"Even the Bible," he adds, "does not escape," referring no doubt to the abominable production of Salome, now disgracing New York, in which the Scriptures have been impiously mangled and distorted to suit a wretched play.

Who is to blame for this lamentable condition of affairs? The public, which patronizes the immoral theatres? The press, which prints their advertisements and praises their meretricious productions? The city officials, who permit the presentation of plays so flagrant that even managers are ashamed of them? Has the Church done its duty in the way of protest? It seems to us that if there was a single spark of public decency or municipal self-respect in New York, Philadelphia, or any other American city, vicious, degenerate, licentious, youth-demoralizing plays would be rendered impossible, either by the establishment of a public censorship or by a vigorous criminal prosecution of all offenders against public morals.

Uncovering One of the Royal Palaces

The Great Gate of Ishtar, Erected by King Nebuchadnezzar

Recent Excavations of Babylon

STRABO, the famous Greek historian and geographer, says that the Hanging Gardens of Babylon and the mighty walls which surrounded the city were included among the seven wonders of the world. Babylon, which had been destroyed by Sennacherib and rebuilt by his son, Esarhaddon, rose under Nebuchadnezzar to a height of splendor and magnificence which had never been surpassed in the long course of her history. Herodotus describes the city as a square, each side being fourteen miles long. He says the city walls were pierced with a hundred brazen gates, and were defended by 250 towers. It is likely that his description is something of an exaggeration, but from the descriptions given by the later Hebrew prophets, it was a city of colossal proportions. For eleven years the German Oriental Society, under the direction of Dr. Robert Koldewey, has been digging among its ruins. Ten years ago the Doctor began work on the mound of the Kasr, or "the palace," as the natives term one of the largest of the city mounds. Two palaces of King Nebuchadnezzar were uncovered and a small temple of the goddess Ninmakh and a larger temple, dedicated to the god Ninib, were thoroughly excavated. The next important discovery was the site of the great Temple of Bel, the city god of Babylon. Then the excavators traced the course of the Sacred Road of Babylon, which led from the Temple of Bel to the royal palaces. But the search of Dr. Koldewey was recently rewarded by the discovery of the great Gate of Ishtar, erected by King Nebuchadnezzar, which was the pride of Babylon. Ishtar, the goddess of love and war, was the most favored one in the Babylonian Pantheon, and the gateway which Nebuchadnezzar erected in her honor was a worthy tribute to her greatness. It is a double gateway, with interior chambers, flanked by massive towers, and was erected at the end of the Sacred Road, at the northeast corner of the southern palace. But its unique character consists in the scheme of decoration on its walls, which are covered with row upon row of bulls and dragons, represented in brilliant enameled bricks. Some of these creatures are flat, and others are raised in relief. It has been reckoned that there were 495 of these creatures.

The world owes a debt of gratitude to this society and to Dr. Koldewey for his great discoveries, and his work at Babylon is not nearly done. Babylon, great in wealth and power, fell on account of her sins. Excessive wealth, ill-gotten gain, pleasure, wine, licentiousness and unbelief threw down her palaces and temples and walls into a heap of ruins, and the spade that uncovers the stones is teaching the world the failure, as well as the folly, of fighting against God. There are modern cities which are cherishing the vices that destroyed Babylon. It is worth their while to listen to the eloquent sermons which these uncovered stones are preaching.

And Babylon shall become heaps. (Jer. 51 : 37.)

Raising Islands

The phosphate region on the west coast of Florida has attracted large public attention which has greatly enhanced the price of real estate Counting upon the opportunity of sales of land, which would arise when the promised improvements along the new line were actually accomplished, and the docks for the handling of the 700,000 tons of phosphate output at Boca Grande were built, an enterprising native planted islands at the mouth of Coral Creek. The first experiment was with a mattress of twisted roots. This was made sixteen feet square, with seeds of water-growing plants, palmetto and live oak scattered over the sand, and with broken shell utilized as top covering. Ropes were tied to the four corners, with large stones as weights. Frequent inspection revealed that sand and silt from the mainland, with extraneous matter from the gulf, washed past the projecting piling of the long bridge and had materially aided the plan. The success of the first island was such that seven others were planted. Three of these are now more than fifty feet in diameter. Connecting them is a sandbar, which promises to form the group into a large and compact body of land.

The world is familiar with the raising of clams and oysters in the ocean, but the cultivation of islands is a novel industry, to be sure; yet there is scarcely any limit to man's ingenuity and his ability to create financial values. There is scarcely a river, lake or bay frontage in America that is not encroached upon, more or less, by the filling in of dirt and stone as a foundation for wharves.

I will make the rivers islands. (Isa. 42 : 15.)

Pharaoh's Stone Heart

The Pharaoh whose heart was hardened against the children of Israel, so that he would not let them go, was otherwise known as Menephtah. The world was surprised and delighted at the discovery recently of his mummy, in the tomb of Amenhotep II. Professor Elliott Smith unwrapped the mummy, and sent sections of the aorta to the Royal College of Physicians, London, the president of which exhibited them to the pathological section. It is now seen that Pharaoh's heart was hardened in the literal sense of the word. The London Lancet says: "The sections show typical senile calcification of the aorta, the bony lamelliform layers being perfectly preserved and the interlamellar material thickly strewn with phosphate of lime."

After thousands of years of slumber in death, science has discovered that Menephtah, the Pharaoh of the Bible, was an old man when he died, and that his heart was hardened physically as well as morally, thus doubly confirming the Scripture.

And the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh, and he hearkened not unto them ; as the Lord had spoken unto Moses. (Ex. 9: 12.)

Women in Parliament of Finland

Dr. Thekla Hultin, a woman member of the Finnish Parliament, gives the following account of the feminine members of the Diet: "At present, there are twenty-five women members of the Diet out of a total of two hundred. The two hundred include three married couples, who take their seats together. Twelve women are married. One is a baroness, while another was a cook and now represents the Finnish servants in the Diet, and edits a newspaper in their interests. Several women representatives are teachers; one is an inspector of factories and others are peasant women. Curiously enough, there are no doctors or artists among them. We are paid £58 for each session, which lasts three months. We do not find that active political work interferes with our domestic work any more than dinner parties, golf or tennis does with the work of women in England. There are no special seats in the Diet for women. They mix in the ordinary way with the men, and the men show no resentment at their presence. As a rule, the women confine themselves to social matters, and leave high politics to the attention of the men."

The women's movement has progressed so far in Finland that two policewomen have been appointed at Helsingfors. They parade the streets like policemen, but their special duty is to look after women malefactors.

There are some States in the American Union where women are allowed to vote and hold office, but they are the exception to the rule. How far England, America and other nations will copy the example of Finland, in according political privileges to their women, remains to be seen. In the history of the world, women have not been admitted to the Parliaments and Senates, nor to the judicial departments of the State; but they have been called frequently to the rulership of an empire, and have displayed singular ability and success in their administration. England was never better ruled than by Queen Victoria, and the slave girl of China, who governed one-fourth of the people of this world, had one of the most able and successful administrations in the history of the nation.

And when the Queen of Sheba heard of the fame of Solomon concerning the name of the Lord, she came to prove him with hard questions. (I. Kings 10 : 1.)

England's Chief Farmer Gone

The death of the Earl of Leicester, recently, removed from the stage one of the most important figures in English country life. The Cokes of Holkham, in Norfolk, have been established in that county since early in the twelfth century. The first to rise to real eminence was Edward Coke, born in 1549, the famous chief justice. His great-grandson was the first Coke to become an Earl of Leicester, but the title died with him. It was revived by Queen Victoria for the father of the Earl who has just died. He was the first commoner whom the late Queen raised to the peerage.

The late Earl, who was created a Knight of the Garter in 1873, was the father of the House of Lords, having been a member of it since 1843. He took less interest in politics, however, than in agriculture, as his father had done before him. When the late Earl succeeded to Holkham much of the estate was a mere barren rabbit warren, some of it unredeemed marsh lands. Father and son, in almost equal amounts, spent over a million pounds in improving and developing the estate. Holkham is regarded as the cradle of English farming of the advanced type. To the Holkham sheep shearings at the end of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth century can be traced the origin of a show system that has done so much to improve live stock. The two Earls of Leicester did more than any others to place English agriculture in the front rank throughout the world. If he is a benefactor who makes two blades of grass grow where one grew before, what a debt of gratitude England owes to the late Earl, who developed such a vast estate and gave such an inspiration to the agricultural interests of the nation.

God intrusted the Earl with noble ancestry and a large earthly estate, and he met those large responsibilities with corresponding wisdom and ability.

For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required ; and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more. (Luke 12 : 48.)

IN A LONELY VENEZUELAN MISSION

A Mule Pack Train in Venezuela

Rev. and Mrs. T. J. Bach and Child

Selling Bibles in a Venezuelan Village

FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT

IT HAS been the experience of all God's children who have walked by faith through this world that they have never been put to shame when, in faith, they have earnestly asked the Lord for help. How good to know and experience that our heavenly Father is the same to-day as in the days of the prophets and the apostles!

To-day, as I was working in our printing shop, a letter was brought in to me in which was enclosed a bill for about $20 for paper which I had ordered for our mission publication, La Estrella de la Mañana (The Morning Star). I laid it right there before the Lord, and asked him for help. About an hour later another letter was brought in to me, in which was enclosed a check for $23 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which amount had been contributed to the Master's work in Venezuela by certain readers of that paper. I thanked the Lord for the gift and his help in time of need, and my heart is filled with gratitude toward the unknown contributors, who are known only of Him for whose cause it was given. Our prayer is that the gift may be used to his honor and glory and for the eternal welfare of the people here.

We are now at the close of the year, and as we look over the daybook we see how every day during the year has had not only its trials and difficulties, but also its blessings. It has been a rather hard year for Venezuela. The bubonic plague has visited the country lately, and that, together with political difficulties, has brought about much poverty. The most necessary things are very expensive; flour is 10 cents a pound, butter 55 cents a pound, kerosene 55 cents a gallon. Two days ago, we bought a box of matches which cost 4 cents, but it only contained thirty matches.

Constantly we have poor people at the door, asking either for food, money or clothes, and we have tried to help as many as possible; but many times, after we have given away our last cent, a hungry one has knocked at the door and told us the circumstances in the home. "Mamma is sick and my brothers and sisters have no food." It is hard to see a poor hungry child at the door begging; but it is still harder to be compelled to say: "We cannot help you." We have taken into our home a poor girl of eight years. She is a very hopeful child, and as the mother has given her to us, we will do what we can to bring her up so that she may be useful in the work for the Master. There are many here who need a helping hand. Poor children, who grow up without knowing what it is to have a home and a father!

We have during the past year experienced much opposition from the priests; nevertheless, the mission work has gone ahead. They have especially opposed the spreading of Bibles, tracts and the little mission paper which we publish. By the Lord's help, we have been able to hold two meetings a week and also Sunday School. They have been fairly well attended. With the assistance of our mission boat, El Heraldo Cristiano, we have been visiting the interior, and we have sold or given away 5 Bibles, 95 Testaments, 80 portions, 2,200 tracts, 8,000 copies of our paper and 335 copies of evangelical books. We are constantly receiving new subscribers for the paper, and now, after one year of work, we are sending it out twice a month and it goes into about thirty different cities and towns in Venezuela.

We thank the Lord for the work which has been done, but we long to do more for him. We pray God's richest blessings on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers for the New Year.

Maracaibo, Venezuela, S. A. T. J. BACH.

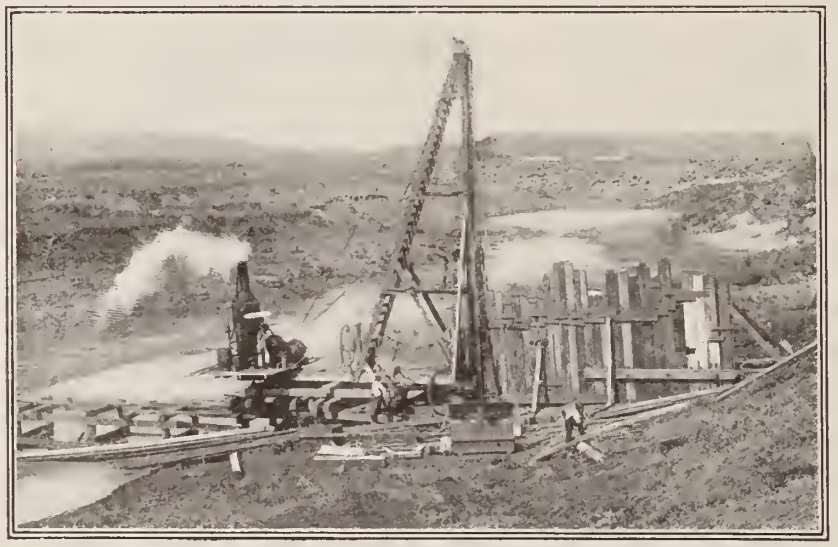
provide for an issue of $500,000,000 of Panama bonds, which his committee did not favor. He called attention to the fact that the minority of the board of consulting engineers declared that if the lock type of canal were adopted the aggregate cost of completing the canal, exclusive of sanitation and expenses of the zone government, would not exceed $139,705,200. That was three years ago. It is now certain that the cost would be not less than $250,000,000, and probably $300,000,000. In any event, it would be at least $100,000,000 in excess of the estimated cost of a sea level canal.

In view of the largely increased cost of the canal, and of the conflicting opinions regarding the comparative merits of the lock and sea level systems, Mr. Taft's report of his Panama trip will be awaited with keen interest. It is understood that he has thus far been a strong advocate of the lock plan. Whether he will still continue to support it, or will favor (probably in his inaugural message) a change not only in the general plan, but in the personnel of the engineering corps in charge of the work, are subjects concerning which there is much speculation.



Driving a Line of Piles Across the Gatun Dam

One correspondent, who accompanied the party to Panama and returned on the same vessel with the President-elect, writes that Mr. Taft and the consulting engineers held a long conference on board the North Carolina. It was then, he says, definitely decided to recommend no change in the canal lock plan. Further, Mr. Taft had frankly declared himself satisfied with the progress made along present lines and would favor continuing to push the work of canal construction with no material change of the present policy. He would, however, have something definite to say concerning safety and economy. The official report (this same correspondent averred) would approve the Gatun dam as now planned, and it would also approve the Colon harbor breakwater and the canal lock system generally.

Kept by his tender care and boundless mercy,
Unharmed by day and darkest hour of night.

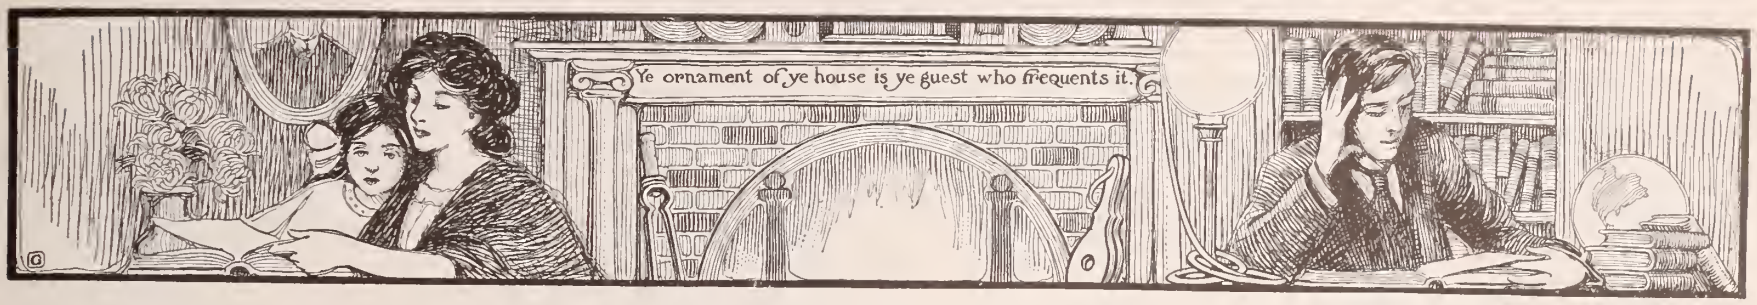
AROUND THE HOME HEARTH



A Recipe for Beauty

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IN looking over a number of letters written by women of all ages and conditions the impression has been made that a woman never grows so old that she becomes indifferent to her looks, and that young women desire very much to be beautiful. Is there a recipe for beauty? What does it consist in, and how it is to be retained? Undoubtedly regular features, bright eyes, a clear skin and good hair and teeth are items that help to make up the sum total of a woman's beauty, so far as her face is concerned. Unless, however, the figure matches the face, unless there is grace in every movement, the most beautiful woman will have an effect of plainness. It is the right of woman to be attractive in appearance, and from girlhood on as sweetheart, wife and mother, as sister and friend, a woman should be lovely to look upon. In the old Bible days, the days when the sacred chronicler told the story of those heroines whose names live forever on the pages of Scripture, mention was often made of beauty. We cannot but suppose that Eve, the mother of all living, was supremely beautiful in face and form. The wife of Abraham was so great a beauty that her husband feared to take her into the perilous neighborhood of a reigning Pharaoh, who might seize upon her as an ornament to his harem. Rachel was so beautiful that Jacob served for her fourteen years, and it seemed to him but a few days in comparison with the love he bore her. Hannah, whose longing for a child drew from her husband the tender reproach, "Am not I better to thee than ten sons?" must have been endowed with every possible feminine grace. Throughout the ages the thought of Ruth brings up an image of delight. The poet wrote:

Long was the good man's sermon,
But it seemed not so to me,
For I thought of Ruth, the beautiful,
And then I thought of thee.

Surely Mary, the mother of our Lord, must have possessed more of the beauty in lineament and expression that makes womanhood angelic than any other woman of our race. And she who broke her alabaster box to anoint the feet of the Master and then wiped them with her hair must have possessed a glorious dower of radiant beauty.

Passing from the sacred narrative to the poets and story-tellers, we everywhere find beauty held at at premium where women are concerned. Shakespeare's heroines have no lack of it, and he but followed Homer, Virgil and Dante in depicting beautiful women. The heroines of history, Mary Queen of Scots, Lady Jane Grey, Marie Antoinette, Josephine, Queen Louisa of Prussia—how few of them there are who were not as famous for good looks as for courage and intellect! The novelists from the earliest to the latest day choose to give us enchanting heroines. If they are men they do not always know how to dress their women, but, to take a somewhat narrow range, from Sir Walter Scott to Sir Gilbert Parker, they disdain to waste their time and talents on ugly women.

To come to a practical everyday view of the matter, what is there that a plain, uncomely girl may do, without resorting to cosmetics, to make herself as beautiful as nature means her every child to be? Nature never turns out a disappointment in the shape of a rose or a lily. Every petal is perfect. With girls it is too often otherwise, but the fault is more their own than that of nature. Avoid sweets is the first necessity in childhood, if womanhood is to be lovely in tint and texture. Sallow skins, dull eyes and rough complexions are largely due to too much indulgence in rich pastry and confectionery. Live in the open air so far as possible. Bathe every day. Take plenty of time for sleep and keep out of heated rooms. Exercise freely. In order to secure the exercise of the muscles and limbs a girl does not need a gymnasium nor an instructor in physical culture. There is a wail all over the land because in our kitchens we can find nobody to help us except ignorant peasants from distant lands, entirely untrained and undisciplined. Suppose our young women, well educated and cultured, turned their attention a little more than they recently have to domesticity. A woman never looks prettier than when, with sleeves rolled to the elbow, she plunges her hands into the bread-bowl and kneads and tosses a ball of dough that shall presently turn into a fair white loaf. Bread-making develops the muscles of the chest and helps to make a woman beautiful. Sweeping, too, is splendid exercise, and if done with windows open and a slightly dampened broom, is not liable to objection on the score that it raises the dust. Good plain food, digested and assimilated, and attention to the functions of the body and the laws of health, will make for excellence in the blood, and upon good blood and active circulation the externals of beauty depend.

Any woman who chooses to take the trouble, and who is amiable and restful in disposition, may be beautiful. Beauty is woman's birthright.

COMING AND GOING

Never mind cold, never mind snow,
As over to grandfather's house we go.
But after the visit is over, then
It is terribly cold to go home again.

Yes, Ma'am, and No, Sir

IN Lord Chesterfield's famous letters to his son the nobleman explicitly tells the youth that to answer a question with plain "yes" or mere "no" is the height of rudeness, and immediately marks the person who does it as extremely ill-bred. We have had a revolt against the use of "sir" and "madam" in this connection, and children are not taught, as they once were, to accord to their elders the mark of respect that these titles imply. They are sometimes taught to say, "Yes, Mrs. Smith," and "No, Mr. Wilson;" but often enough one hears the rough brusqueness of a curt "yes" or "no," and now and then the vulgarity of "yep" and "nope." These latter expressions fairly touch bottom in an outer depth of impoliteness. Anybody who says "yep" is unfit for society. Old-fashioned people still cling to "Yes, ma'am," and "Please, ma'am," and one seldom meets a courtly Southern man or woman who has abandoned the old form. Fine manners are a great distinction. There is no servility either in "ma'am" or in "sir." There is, indeed, nothing in either that should offend the most fastidious. A boy addressing his father or his teacher or his employer seems far more courteous in saying "sir" than in its omission.

Perhaps when we get back in our common speech to the beautiful custom of calling women and men ladies and gentlemen, when they are entitled to that honor, we shall again hear "Yes, ma'am," "No, ma'am," "Yes, sir," "No, sir," as we formerly did. Old-school manners may well have a renaissance. It is too bad to let them vanish in these hurrying days, when hustle and bustle, hurry and worry, are driving leisure from the face of the earth. Leisure and politeness somehow go hand in hand.

A Unique Festivity

The report of a unique festivity comes from Portland, Ore., where a gentleman celebrated his eighty-fourth birthday by a banquet to which were invited the widows of the town. Seventy-six widows, young and old, were Mr. Brown's guests on the occasion. The oldest of these ladies was ninety-one and the youngest twenty-five years of age. Mr. Brown presided at the banquet, which was, shall we say, a merry widow affair. He called on his guests for after-dinner speeches, and they were quite ready to respond. An incident of the day, which must have delighted the children of the city, was the scattering of $100 in nickels from the Court House steps, the children scrambling for the treasure. The shadow side to such a gathering is, of course, the thought that the strenuous life of to-day is terribly hard upon men. A prominent lawyer of New York observed last summer that women survived the hardships of life while men fell by the way. The pace to-day is tremendous, and it wears out the bread-winner often before he reaches middle age.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—ABOUT THE ENGAGEMENT RING. "If one cares for only one ring, is it proper to wear a plain gold band for an engagement, or should that only be worn as a wedding ring?" There is no real necessity to wear an engagement ring, but a bride should have her wedding ring on her wedding day. The wedding ring is always a plain gold band, or circlet.

Helping the Italian Waldenses

EARLY in the present relief campaign in Italy an appeal was made to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in behalf of the Waldenses, whose churches and people, in both Sicily and Calabria, had suffered greatly from the earthquake. The Waldenses, as readers of this journal probably know, are the descendants of the famous band of Christians who were bitterly persecuted for their faith in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and who gave hundreds of noble martyrs to the cause of Christ. Their original home was in the valleys of Piedmont, but, thriving despite persecution, they have become, though small, one of the most energetic and devoted missionary churches the world has yet known.

In the section of Southern Italy devastated by the recent earthquake, the Waldensians had some forty-five churches, some in seacoast towns and others in remote villages in the interior. From the Rev. V. Alberto Costabel, a Waldensian pastor, now in this country as a delegate to the Evangelical Churches of North America, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received details of the situation among these afflicted Waldensian Protestant churches. Hundreds of their members were killed in the great cataclysm and the injured will reach a much larger number. Most of their churches are in ruins. To assist the injured and the homeless Waldenses, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has forwarded, in response to their appeals, the sum of $5,000 to Rev. Arturo Muston, president of the Waldensian Mission Board in Rome, having the assurance that the money will be applied in direct relief measures for the most needy.

Pastor Costabel writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

On the 27th of last December the Waldensian Church at Messina numbered 162 communicants, 75 Sunday School children and 40 catechumens; about 500 people, old and young, being more or less intimately connected with that evangelical community. When, on the following morning, a gloomy light dawned upon the stricken city only a third of those people were spared to realize the extent of the disaster which had befallen them. The rest had perished under the falling walls of their homes.

The Waldensian house of worship, which, on its dedication to God in 1874, had been described as a "beautiful temple, bright and simple and solemn as the prayers that ascend from it to God"—their temple—had been utterly destroyed. Their young and devoted minister lay buried up to his shoulders in the debris of his house, unconscious alike of the deaths of his wife and child. In great agony, he withstood death for four long days.

The wealthiest lady of the Waldensian congregation writes to Mrs. Costabel (the wife of the writer): "Family affections, substance, everything has been snatched from us in a moment, and we have been cast away from all that was our life. But, God be praised, my little one has been left to me, and I must be thankful." Factories, tanneries, stores belonging to these people have been hopelessly wrecked. Hunger and thirst were their lot in the cold rain and the freezing wind—present destitution and a hopeless outlook. The same misfortune fell to the rich and the poor, to the cultured and refined, to the hardy laborer and the weather-beaten fisherman.

Only a few survivors remain of this band of Christians, who had long struggled and suffered for the sake of faith and freedom. Now they have become wanderers in a land which is not their own, among people who pity them, but do not always understand them. Rev. Arturo Muston, the president of our Missionary Board, will expend funds intrusted to him for the relief of our suffering brethren.

God only knows how very dark this hour is to many of our afflicted brethren. But nevertheless, a light of renewed faith and hope and healing love is shining in Italy's darkness.

V. ALBERTO COSTABEL,
Pastor Waldensian Evangelical Church, Haverford, Pa.

Praise for American Relief Work

All Italy is deeply grateful for the relief that is being accorded the stricken inhabitants in the south of the peninsula, and in the island of Sicily. Over one million one hundred thousand people were affected by the disaster, according to a letter received by the Central Committee of the Red Cross from Hon. Lloyd Griscom, the American Ambassador to Italy. Mr. Griscom speaks in high terms of American relief work. "When we entered the harbor of Messina," he writes, "Commander Belknap called my attention to the fact that it was just sixty hours since we chartered the steamer." The steamer was the Bayern, toward whose cargo the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contributed $30,000 worth of supplies.

"Our extreme haste would have been unjustified," continues the letter, "if our equipment had proved insufficient, but fortunately the expedition made good. . . . I am now being bombarded by grateful letters from the various prefects. . . . Over one million one hundred thousand persons have been rendered houseless or have houses badly damaged.

The first temporary needs of the stricken people were looked after by the Bayern, or by money sent subsequent to the sailing of the vessel. The hope, however, that all or nearly all had been helped has not yet been realized. The suffering among the women who have lost their husbands, and who have families of small children to care for, is pitiful in the extreme. The number of homeless little orphans has grown to an appalling figure, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, through its Mothers and Babies Fund, is doing all possible to stem this rising tide of misery. Much has been accomplished with the money sent to good Queen Helena, who has thrown herself heart and soul into the movement to help these unfortunates, whose welfare is so near her heart. Her agents appear every day at the hospitals, providing for as many of the women and babies as possible, and wishing that the money at their command could be expended in some way to meet the tragic need that calls to them on every hand. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should contribute now to the Mothers and Babies Fund, if they wish to have the satisfaction of aiding this most worthy cause before the fund is closed. A quick response, even if the sum is small, will do far more good than if a large amount were sent later.

When a CHRISTIAN HERALD representative called on the Italian Ambassador, Baron des Planches, in Washington, the Baron spoke with heartfelt emotion of the great good that is now being done by the Mothers and Babies Fund. He dwelt feelingly on the plight of that most helpless class—the mothers and babies—and said that he thought that the charity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers could not have been more wisely directed and that he was sure no money had been sent to Italy which had filled a greater want. He said, in addition, that the need of this most helpless class would be of longer duration than any other.

Woman's Progress in Turkey

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will remember that a short time ago a serious fire destroyed one of the principal buildings of the American College for Girls in Constantinople. This college was situated in Scutari, on the Asiatic shore of the Bosphorus. A new site, containing about fifty acres of land, has been purchased on the European side of the Bosphorus. The wonderful revolution of July 24 has broadened the opportunity for American education in Turkey. A few days after July 24, when the Constitution was announced, the legal title to the new site for the college was easily obtained. The American College for Girls now bids fair to be one of the important colleges of the world.

Students of the American College

The new site is beautiful and picturesque. It comprises a park finely laid out with walks and trees and grassy lawns, a private drive to the Bosphorus, and a water front of 140 feet. It is situated on the heights above Arnaoutkeuy, a village on the Bosphorus, easily reached from Constantinople.

Freedom now exists in Turkey to attend foreign schools, and Mohammedan girls are everywhere pressing forward. The American College for Girls will be an ally of the reform movement in building up a new Turkey. There is no better means of effecting this than through the education of the women of the land.

Curious incidents occur now in Constantinople in the blending of the old and the new. Quite recently, there was a procession in connection with the new Parliament, which is now in session in Constantinople, in which there figured both an automobile and a camel. In almost every carriage might be seen a Mohammedan seated by the side of a Christian, often giving the Christian the place of honor. Turkish priests were seated amicably in the same carriage with Christian priests of the different churches, all happy together over the new opportunity which freedom has brought them.

The American College has furnished one leader among Mohammedan women—Halideh Salih—who has been called once and again the first woman in popularity and influence in the Turkish empire. She is the only Mohammedan woman in the empire who holds the degree of Bachelor of Arts. She is writing and speaking with force and power under the new conditions, and is helping the new movement on every hand.

Mohammedan women at first threw off their veils when freedom was announced; but this was severely criticised, and the women immediately showed their patriotism by resuming them again. There is no subject more widely discussed in the Turkish press to-day than the education of women. New schools for girls are to be organized throughout the empire, and for these trained teachers will be needed, and the American College for Girls should be ready to furnish them. Its president, Dr. Mary Mills Patrick, who is now visiting the United States, can be addressed at 507 Fifth Avenue, New York City, by those persons who are interested in the college and who would be pleased to be identified with its progress hereafter.

A CHILD SCULPTOR

IT IS always to be expected that children will imitate their parents. The author or editor has a nursery full of little scribblers. The artist has to provide brushes and paints for his offspring. The preacher's children hold meetings, and the doctor's children treat patients. But it is seldom that these imitations amount to more than to pass away the time of the children and amuse their parents.

Mr. Edwin W. Deming, the sculptor, has a little girl of nine, however, who not only imitates her father in his modeling of figures, especially of animals, but bids fair to equal or surpass him in the near future. Little Katherine Deming has a passion for visiting Central and Bronx Parks and reproducing in clay the creatures that she sees in the cages there. Many of these reproductions look like the work of a mature artist. The weakness and futility of line which usually accompany the attempts of children and amateurs in any department of artistic endeavor are absent from Miss Katherine's figures. Such animal experts as Ernest Thompson-Seton, Dr. Charles Eastman, the Indian lecturer, and William J. Long declare that this child is a genius, and predict that she is destined to become a very great animal sculptor.

Little Katherine goes to school, but does not care for her books. She hurries home every day to her beloved modeling, or else goes to the park to watch the beasts there. She has done many good bas-reliefs and figures; but her most famous achievement is a "rocking Teddy Bear," which has been cast in bronze and decorates the studios of many New York artists. Miss Katherine saw some baby bears one day rocking back and forth in their play, detected in an instant the artistic and novel charm of their pose, and hastened home to reproduce it in clay.

She is physically a normal, healthy, romping child, and seems to be endowed with the constitution which she needs in order to develop her remarkable genius.

The Mardin Sufferers Grateful

AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, MASS.

My Dear Dr. Klopsch: Personally and on behalf of the American Board, I wish to express our profound appreciation for the loyal service you and your readers have rendered the cause of humanity, as well as the cause of Christ, in the money which you have raised and have sent for the relief of the Mardin sufferers in northern Mesopotamia. At a time like this, when the whole situation is exceedingly delicate in that country, as between Mohammedanism and Christianity, such a manifestation of the pure Christian spirit as this gift reveals cannot but make a profound impression upon all Mohammedans. The value of this fact is greatly enhanced when we remember that nearly all, if not all, of the sufferers in this instance are probably Mohammedans. To have a Christian nation and a Christian newspaper like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD come to their relief at a time like this cannot fail to impress upon them the fact that Christianity has something inherent in itself that Mohammedanism seemingly lacks.

Again let me thank you and express my great regard for the good work THE CHRISTIAN HERALD never fails to do.

Most sincerely yours,

Reading the Bible with Interest*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE Open Bible—it was in the hands of a black man of great distinction, the Secretary of the Treasury to the Candace (queen) of Ethiopia, whose realm was in Africa, that part now known as the English Soudan. The Bible was opened at the book of Isaiah, and the man was reading as he rode in his chariot, near the desert region of Gaza, returning to his own land from Jerusalem. He had bought the book while there, and had heard much concerning Jesus. It was rather remarkable that he was reading aloud, although reading to himself. His attention was fastened upon Isa. 53:7, 8. "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter, and as a lamb before his shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth." He read with interest, but not with clear understanding.

Philip the Teacher

A teacher sent from God. It was Philip. God had seen the perplexity of the man with the open Bible, and had sent his angel to Philip in Samaria to tell him to go down on the way to Gaza. It was a fifty mile run. When Philip espied the man in the chariot, the Spirit of God said to him, "Go near and join thyself to his chariot." And Philip ran and came near to the chariot, and heard the treasurer reading the Bible aloud. And Philip asked, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" The treasurer confessed that he did not, and asked Philip to come and sit beside him in the chariot and explain the Scripture to him. And then the treasurer began to ask him questions. Philip answered him by telling him all about Jesus. And so wise was the teacher, and so teachable was the treasurer, that he understood very soon that Jesus was the Saviour, and seeing some water—a river, or a lake—he begged Philip to baptize him in the name of Jesus. And the record is, "He baptized him." Afterward the treasurer continued his journey to his home land, probably a thousand miles away; while the teacher, Philip, was spirited away to Azotus (Ashdod), not many miles distant, to preach the Gospel (Acts 8:39, 40). We are told the treasurer went on his way rejoicing. He could say, with the prophet Jeremiah, "Thy words were found, and I did eat them, and thy words were unto me a joy, and the rejoicing of my heart" (Jer. 15:16). He had learned to read the Bible with true interest.

Rest in my reverent hand,
O Chart, whereby
Lost man may understand
His destiny:
What his appointed way
And what the goal,
And what the powers that slay
Or save the soul.

—"To a Bible," by the Bishop of Derry and Raphoe.

The treasurer owned the Bible he was reading. The avidity with which he read the Bible is an indication that it was a new book to him. Let us not overlook the fact that it was only the Old Testament, probably only the prophecy of Isaiah, which he had, the New Testament not then being written. It is possible that he may have heard of the Bible by the account given by the wise men of the searching of the Scriptures when Herod had desired to find out about the Child who was born King of the Jews. It is possible that some of the Jews who had been scattered about by persecutions at Jerusalem had settled in the realm of Candace, and that the treasurer had seen their Bibles, and so had come to desire one for his very own. We are told that he had gone to Jerusalem to worship; therefore, from some source, he must have learned about the true God. The treasurer's Bible was very odd in appearance, being written by hand on a sheepskin roll, and for which he had paid a great price, so large that a copy of the Scriptures was seldom owned by an individual. The story of little Mary Jones, who wished to buy a Bible, is probably familiar to all, but it is worth repeating. Her home was in Wales, and she lived a little over one hundred years ago. The school she attended was two miles from her home. As soon as she learned to read, she walked to a neighbor's home, two miles farther, that she might read the Bible in the home of a farmer, who had the peculiar distinction of owning a Bible. It was a never-to-be-forgotten moment when Mary Jones began to read the Bible. She resolved that she would some day possess a Bible of her own. "I must have one," she said, "if I save up for it for ten years." The farmer's wife gave her a cock and two hens, that she might get some money by selling eggs. She got a Bible money box, and put into it all she could earn, and in four years she had enough to buy a Bible. She was then sixteen years old. The nearest place where she could buy a Bible was Bala, twenty-five miles away. One morning, after an early breakfast of hot bread and milk, she started out on the journey, on foot, and reached her destination by nightfall, but too late to purchase the Bible that night. She stayed all night in the home of a clergyman, who took her next morning to Mr. Charles, who sold Bibles. Mr. Charles said: "My dear child, I am deeply grieved to have to disappoint you, but all of the Welsh Bibles I received last year from London were sold months ago, excepting a few I have kept for friends, whom I must not disappoint." Mary buried her face in her hands and sobbed aloud. Mr. Charles' heart was touched, and he determined she should have a Bible, even though one of his friends must be disappointed. He went to the cupboard and got it for her; then her tears were changed to smiles, and she began at once her return home with her treasure. That very Bible may still be seen in London, and written on it, "Mary Jones was the true owner of this Bible, bought in the year 1800, aged sixteen years."

The Bible and the Japanese

Mr. Charles afterward told this incident in London, and it prompted the organization of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and then of the American Bible Society, and of Bible Societies in other lands, until in nearly every part of the world people may have Bibles at the face cost of printing, or as free gifts if they cannot pay for them.

Very timely is the following story about some Japanese sailors who were given copies of the New Testament. The Iyo Maru lay in the Albert docks. She was a Japanese transport, and swarmed with six hundred sailors, who were to take over the Mikado's new battleship Kashima, at Newcastle. They were Togo's sailors. A party of visitors and Bible Society officials were welcomed on board by Lieutenant-Commander Kana Kanie. A whistle sounded, and the men sprang into line with promptitude. The inevitable photographer was there and took a picture.

The next business was to distribute the Japanese Testaments to the men and the English Testaments to the officers. "We have lifted the lids of your boxes, all is in readiness," a polite Japanese purser informed us. "Fall into line on the lower deck!" cried the lieuteant-commander. When the men stood at attention, a special presentation copy of the Scriptures was handed to the lieutenant-commander himself. He took it in both hands and bowed over it. Then he raised it solemnly to his forehead in a very impressive manner. "And it is English!" he exclaimed, showing it to his brother officers before he carried it away to his stateroom. Indeed, he was so delighted with his copy that, when later his photograph was being taken, he said: "First let me get my book." And, hurrying to his room, he returned with the Bible in his hand. What a sight it was to witness those 600 men march past in double file and receive a New Testament! Invariably the sacred volume was raised to the forehead. Some also saluted before they received it. A few ventured to air their English and to say, "Thank you!" All were most eager to receive the gift, stretching out their hands for it, and a few late-comers ran up hastily, as if they feared they might be too late. "Thank you, commander," said the leader of the Bible Society's deputation, when all was over, "for the trouble you have taken, for the time you have devoted to us and for your kind reception of us." "But it is we that are honored," he politely replied; "and we thank you for the books." As the party turned away, they noticed some sailors who evidently were anxious to speak to them. They pushed forward one of their number. "I—thank—you—much—for—book," he began, nervously. After a pause, he continued, "I—am—Christian—too—yes!" with a bright smile.

Thus the Book and the witnesses were left behind to testify to the Truth. Each one in the party longed more than he had ever before done that the Book and the witness might hasten the day when Japan would acknowledge "Jesus Christ as Lord to the glory of God the Father."

The Treasurer Read Attentively

He read to himself, but read aloud. Undoubtedly the voice is a help to the understanding, even if it is one's own voice. There is a psychological reason for this: the brain centres controlled by the ear in hearing, and by the mouth in speaking, are brought into exercise, thus making attention more complete. There are yet other helps to the attentive reading of the Bible.

The story is told of a boy in school who was seen to spread out all of his neckties on a bed, and then choose one and carefully fold it and lay it in his Bible. The matron saw him do it, and she asked, "Why do you put the necktie in your Bible, Alfred?" He blushed at being found out. "Well, you see, I belong to the Scripture Union, but I often forget to read my portion. So I have found out a patent way of remembering." "Yes?" said the matron, not quite comprehending. "Don't you see, that's the necktie I am to wear to-morrow. I always choose it the night before. When I look for it in the morning, it always reminds me of my Scripture Union portion."

Even before a child can read he may be powerfully impressed by looking at a Bible.

President Augustus H. Strong says: "One of the earliest recollections of my childhood is that of a great family Bible, with a cover of brilliant red, which stood upon the centre table of our humble parlor. One day I stood upon tip-toe and ventured to open it. Upon the title-page I saw the picture of a book, from which rays of light seemed to stream in every direction. A feeling of awe seized me; God seemed to be in the book; the book was almost God.

"In that picture, and in my childish impression of it, there was a solemn truth, and I would not undervalue it. But I have learned to correct the symbol. The Bible is not an original source of light; it only transmits the light of Christ. It is not an original source of power; it only serves as the vehicle and instrument of Christ's power. Christ is the source from which the rays proceed, and Scripture is but the earthly mirror that reflects his glory. Like the Holy Spirit who inspired it, it does not magnify itself; it takes of the things of Christ and shows them to us."

In this connection read the Golden Text, John 5:39. In the Red Letter Edition of the Bible, issued by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, one may study the Bible with Christ, as all of the words quoted by him are printed in red. What it will mean thus to go through the Scriptures with Christ for our Bible teacher!

Have you ever read the Bible so attentively that you have memorized any portion?

A FAST FLEETING BARGAIN

IN our issue of January 27 we announced that the balance of our edition of THE WEDDING RING, by the late Rev. Dr. T. DeWitt Talmage—and one of the most inspired and inspiring works from his talented pen—would be closed out, in order to make shelf room for new publications, at the low price of 25 Cents per Copy.

So many orders promptly rained in upon our Book Department, in response to this Bargain Offer, that we have now but a few dozen copies left. These beautiful books are in no way damaged or worn, and as the remaining stock will doubtless be entirely sold in a few days we urge every one of our readers, who desires a copy, to write us at once before it is too late.

Marriage is a subject near to the heart of all mankind; universally interesting; tremendously important; and here is a volume which has never failed to carry a blessed influence into every home where it has gone. The wise counsel which Dr. Talmage gives in these discourses to husbands and wives, young people and parents, and his interpretation of Scriptural passages bearing on the marriage bond and the sacredness of home ties, must leave a deep impression on one and all. His advice on "The Choice of a Husband" and "The Choice of a Wife," and his able talks on "The Relation of Wife to Husband and Husband to Wife," have helped hundreds upon hundreds of readers to act carefully and judiciously in those matters, large and small, that so often decide the destinies of loved ones for time and eternity, or upon which rests the happiness of the home. "Matrimonial Discords," "Maternity" and "Woman Enthroned" are other exquisite chapters from this absorbing volume.

Please remember that if you wish to take advantage of the present low price of 25 cents on our limited number of copies of THE WEDDING RING, a small but great masterpiece, let us have your order at the earliest possible moment. Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Book Department, 92 Bible House, New York City.

A House Built for Bees

IN the garden of a schoolmaster who lives in a little German town stand the most remarkable beehives in the world. One of these, that representing a villa, is shown in the picture. Other hives are in the form of a castle, a sentry, an inn, a windmill, a lion, a bear, and an elephant. The villa, in particular, which the owner calls "Honey Villa," is built with the greatest care, and can boast such signs of human habitation as window-curtains. Two and sometimes three swarms of bees live in it.

A Strange Home for Bees

The Alaska Exposition

ANOTHER beautiful exposition city is rising like magic in the Northwest in Seattle, State of Washington. The Exposition will be known as the Alaska-Yukon Exposition, and will show to the world the wonders of the new El Dorado that lies at the very northwest of the American continent. Of course, an exposition in Alaska itself was out of the question, the distance being prohibitive and the facilities for preparing such an exposition wanting. Seattle, however, is the great port through which the tide of travel to and from Alaska flows, and it is at Seattle that merchant and prospector fit themselves out for their voyage and for their store or work in their new home. So the selection of the city was most appropriate. Work has continued all this fall and winter in order to have the buildings ready for the opening in June this year. The exposition grounds are those of the State University, and some of the buildings, after the exposition's close, will be used for collegiate purposes. It is said to be the most beautiful site for an educational institution, with the exception of Cornell.

The most unique and beautiful feature of the exposition will be the cascade, with a fountain, the latter to illustrate "the Spirit of the Pacific." At the top of the design will be a winged figure of heroic size, and about will be grouped figures to show the races that originally surrounded the Pacific Ocean.

PRIZE FOOD

Palatable, Economical, Nourishing.

A Nebr. woman has outlined the prize food in a few words, and that from personal experience. She writes:

"After our long experience with Grape-Nuts, I cannot say enough in its favor. We have used the food almost continually for seven years.

"We sometimes tried other advertised breakfast foods but we invariably returned to Grape-Nuts as the most palatable, economical and nourishing of all.

"When I quit tea and coffee and began to use Postum and Grape-Nuts, I was a nervous wreck. I was so irritable I could not sleep nights, had no interest in life.

"After using Grape-Nuts a short time I began to improve and all these ailments have disappeared and now I am a well woman. My two children have been almost raised on Grape-Nuts, which they eat three times a day.

"They are pictures of health and have never had the least symptom of stomach trouble, even through the most severe siege of whooping cough they could retain Grape-Nuts when all else failed.

"Grape-Nuts food has saved doctor bills, and has been, therefore, a most economical food for all."

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

George Hunter and Dudley Verner were college chums and are stopping at the country home of the former. George is introdueed to Miss Danforth, daughter of Squire Danforth, who lives on the fine estate called "Paradise." A village character, Jack Green, takes them to see "Paradise." They there meet Miss Danforth, and Dudley is introduced. As they leave, the Squire drives by on the way home. His daughter is surprised at his sudden return. He says he is going abroad, and will take her and her aunt. They go to call on Mrs. Hunter and her niece, Miss Sanborn. The Squire discovers that Mrs. Hunter is an old friend. On his return he tells Aunt Phœbe a family secret, which greatly agitates her. Dudley Verner starts life as a doctor in a quiet neighborhood. The two friends save a little boy named Donald Fraser from being run over. Mrs. Fraser was George's aunt, who had run away to marry Captain Fraser. They lost track of her. George finds she has been badly treated and deserted. Mrs. Fraser discovers that her husband still lives and again disappears. Squire Danforth finds a friend in an insane asylum who has information which may lift his daughter writes, a cloud from his life. George's mother proposes to go to Long Branch. Jack Green comes to George and informs him that Captain Fraser was looking for the Hunter family to find his wife. George has his mother and cousin prepare for an early start. Green drives Fraser to the Hunter home so slowly that he arrives too late. The Hunter party stops in New York. Captain Fraser finds them and demands to see Mrs. Hunter and his wife. He will not believe that the latter is not with them. George comes in and informs him he knows something about him which will put him in safe keeping for some time. The captain leaves. Mrs. Hunter is hurried to Long Branch. The young men out walking think they see Donald Fraser, but he disappears in the crowd. Verner tells George the story of his life; that he was adopted while Mr. Verner was traveling in Spain. George and Dudley reseue Donald from a kidnapper and George is hurt. Mrs. Fraser and Donald are brought to Mrs. Hunter. All return in the fall to Mrs. Hunter's home. Ellen improves in health. A letter is received from Marion saying they will return to New York and that they are going to Mexico, where her father is interested in a plantation.

ONE lovely afternoon, all were sitting on the piazza at Branksome, Mrs. Hunter, Mrs. Fraser and Lily watching little Donald as he gamboled on the lawn with old Brownie, the favorite dog, when a messenger boy came with a telegram for Lily from George, stating that he would be home that evening, and that he wished her and Ellen to return to New York with him.

Mrs. Hunter wondered greatly what could be the matter, and Lily surmised that the time was near when the trouble connected with Captain Fraser and all the dreadful occurrences at Long Branch might have to be explained to her. She and Ellen both felt that something of more than ordinary import caused the message to be sent. They made haste at once to prepare for the journey, and Donald was very proud when told he was to be left as a protector for auntie.

George came ere long, and explained that he had only an hour to spend, as they must catch the express for New York.

Telling his mother that he would be back in a few minutes for dinner, he asked his aunt to accompany him for a walk. When at a safe distance from the house, and his mother's eyes and ears, he told her that through Dudley he had learned that a man, whose name was registered as Fraser, in a New York hospital, was dying. He had been injured in trying to escape from a burning building where he had been drinking and carousing all night long. When he had become conscious, Dudley had questioned him, and had found that he was the Captain Fraser for whom they had been searching.

Taking his aunt's hand, George said, "Aunt Ellen, he would like to see you. I have promised, knowing what you are, that you will go, so I have come for you. He is dying a conscience-stricken, heart-broken man. He longs for time to repair the wrongs done to you and the child."

Ellen was sobbing by this time, as though her heart would break, and immediately rising to her feet, said, "Let us go at once, George, I must see him once more—my poor Tom!"

Her woman's heart went out to the one for whom she had left home and friends, promising to love and honor him. Forgetting all her wrongs, she thought only of his sufferings and of his going out into eternity, perhaps unthinking and unprepared.

George begged of her to be calm, saying that as the time had come when he must explain everything to his mother it must be done with the least possible excitement.

After a hurriedly eaten meal, Ellen and Lily went to make their final preparations; while George told his mother the whole story of their trouble at Long Branch, giving her a sufficient excuse for hiding the matter so long from her, in that she was in too weak a condition to bear the anxiety attending such a painful affair.

She was very tender and pitiful over George's dreadful sickness, and felt that he had been wise in keeping all the facts from her. It was, as she fully realized, quite a different matter to hear this now from what it would have been while he was absent from her.

"Have no anxiety about me while you are away, George. Of course, Lily must go with Ellen, but I shall have the child, and Elsie is a host in herself. We shall manage nicely, now that I am so much stronger, and you will write to me each day."

"Most assuredly I will, giving you full particulars of everything that occurs. You may be sure I will not keep back anything, so you need not be anxious."

"Poor, dear Ellen!" she said; "how my heart aches for her! What a trying ordeal awaits her! I need not tell you to be very gentle with her."

"We shall all do everything in our power for her; and now we must be off."

Dudley met them in New York, and, after a much-needed meal, they drove at once to the hospital. With a warning to be calm, Ellen was admitted to her husband's bedside.

Her heart went out in pitying tenderness as she saw the wasted, pallid face and heard the labored breathing of the once strong man.

What passed at that meeting Ellen never fully revealed, though she said that her husband had made the most repentant confessions to her, and she always expressed great thankfulness that she had been in time to hear them.

When Dudley entered the room, anxious for the welfare of both the husband and wife, he found that the angel of death had been there. Beside the lifeless form of Captain Fraser knelt Ellen, quite unconscious, though her hand was closely clasping his rigid fingers. The young doctor bore her to another room, where the hospital attendants labored long and hard ere the weary eyelids unclosed. As soon as possible, she was removed to a room in a house near by, procured by Dudley from one of his former patients. Here they had many comforts, but it was several days before she was able to be removed to Branksome.

By that time, after a stormy passage, Squire Danforth, Mrs. Langdon and Marian had returned.

The reunion was very pleasant, but poor Ellen's condition, even after her return, was so alarming that the family in Mrs. Hunter's home had little heart for social enjoyment.

THE LITTLE DOCTOR

All that the best medical skill and loving care could bestow were freely lavished upon her, but although deeply grateful for every kindness she showed little or no interest in the affairs of life and nothing seemed to rouse her but the sight of her child.

Week after week passed away until the holidays were close at hand. Donald was to go on Christmas Eve to the little church near by, which was to be beautifully decorated for the occasion.

Marian was busy in making preparations for her journey to Mexico; but for the sake of the child, who had taken a strong hold upon her affections, she went, in company with his cousins, as he called George and Dudley, to the Christmas celebration.

Aunt Phœbe was to remain at home with the trusty servants, having no desire for further travel; but, at Mrs. Hunter's request, a part of each day was to be spent with her. The Squire and Marian heartily approved of this. The daily visit would prevent loneliness, and as Mrs. Langdon was a famous nurse and skilled in preparing delicacies for the sick, her help would be invaluable in caring for Mrs. Fraser.

The travelers left home during the first week in January. Business would detain them in New York for a short time, and they were to sail for Yucatan on the sixteenth.

Again George and Dudley were among those who went to see them off, after a delightful time spent in New York.

The old Squire had more than once been moved at the recital by his friend of Dudley's noble deeds. The part he had played in regard to Ellen and her child had been particularly pleasing to him.

As they were about to part now on board the steamer, the old gentleman took Dudley aside, and, slipping into his hand a generous check, said, "I hope when we return to see you often in my home, Dr. Verner. I am interested in your work here. Please use this money among the poor, as you see it is necessary."

Dudley thanked him warmly, scarcely less surprised than grateful.

CHAPTER XV

THE family at "Elm Hill," the name which had been given to Mrs. Hunter's home, were making the best of the severely cold weather that set in toward the latter part of January.

Usually, the mornings were spent in the cozy sitting room, which had been fitted up for Ellen's use, and where, upon a couch or in an easy chair, she rested, while the cheerful conversation flowed on. In the afternoon, she was left undisturbed, so that she might, if possible, gain a little strength through sleep; and then the family spent a quiet hour in the evening with her, before she retired to rest.

She seemed to have no special disease, but to feel simply a gradual failing of her powers, and almost complete indifference regarding the affairs of life around her.

Aunt Phœbe's daily visits were looked forward to eagerly by all. She was in her element in a sick-room, and her presence always seemed to give strength. When there she even forgot to lament about the loss of her husband, and to compare the present degenerate days with the past.

Many an old story of her girlhood was recalled then and was related in a manner that gave delight to all. Little Donald especially loved to hear of the games and winter pastimes of the children when Aunt Phœbe was young.

He could hardly believe, as he looked at her, that she ever had been a little girl! To his ten years seventy seemed very, very old.

Dudley had been, from the first, eager to cure Donald's lameness. He had made a thorough study of his case and had consulted other physicians, and he had come to the conclusion that in order to have him properly treated he would have to be sent to New York. There was another and very weighty reason for this, in the fact that the child's mother could not bear the strain consequent upon the necessary treatment, should it be given at home.

During a visit from both George and Dudley, the child was consulted upon the matter, and expressed a willingness to go to the city, "if mamma was willing."

Ellen was at first inclined to object to the proposed plan; but when all the facts of the case were placed before her she yielded, feeling that Donald would be in good hands and that she could endure any sacrifice for the sake of curing his lameness.

It was decided that Donald should accompany George and Dudley back to New York, so that there could be no time for his mother to change her mind. It was important that the treatment should begin as soon as possible. The longer he remained in his present condition, the less hope of a cure there would be.

About the first of February they returned to the city; and, although the greater part of the sunshine of her life was with him, Donald's mother said "good-by" smilingly to the little one, who shouted, "Won't it be nice, mamma, to come back walking without a crutch?"

Her face reflected his joy until he was quite out of sight, but the sound of the carriage wheels had hardly ceased when she gave way to such a fit of sobbing that all the powers of Mrs Hunter, Mrs. Langdon and the faithful Elsie were taxed to quiet her. She was very ill after this for a long time and Aune Phœbe was almost constantly with her.

After she began slowly to recover, and to be able to rest in her easy chair in the sitting-room again, she had one morning a long, quiet talk with Mrs. Hunter, in which she revealed to that faithful sister much which she had not known heretofore, and laid plans for the future control and guidance of Donald that rather startled her.

"Why, Ellen, you will be here to guide and train your child yourself!"

"No, Dora dear; I need not hide my convictions from you. I shall never recover from this illness. My life is shaken to its very foundation.

"But I know that I leave my child in good hands. You will care for and train him, and I leave him trustingly In your hands. It is far easier for me to die now than it would have been a few months ago. I really have no care to leave. All has been beautifully ordered for me."

"My dear Ellen, you break my heart. I have planned a life of comfort and ease for you, and of happiness for all of us. Your coming has been a blessing to me already."

"You are very good to say that to me, after all the trouble and care I have been to you, Dora, my sister; but I strongly feel that for me life's work is nearly over. How often I have faltered and drooped by the way! How I have grieved! And yet all the time this beautiful ending was being planned for me. I have been very happy here, Dora."

Questions and Answers

L. W. B., Mississippi. Kindly tell me whether the Niagara Falls have ever been frozen solid?

No; the force of the water is such that it is impossible for ice to form. If that ever occurred there would be an enormous flood on the upper reaches of the river. On the 29th of March, 1848, the Niagara River, obstructed by ice at Lake Erie, ran nearly dry above the falls for one day.

Reader. What disposal would be made of property in the State of Massachusetts, where a woman died leaving a husband and sisters? What share would go to each, there being no will?

Husband takes $5,000 and one-half the property, real and personal, remaining, assuming there are no children or grandchildren. Of course, debts of deceased are paid first of all.

C. C. W., Rinehart, W. Va., 1. What nation has the largest navy? 2. What is the largest war vessel in the world?

1. Great Britain has the most powerful fleet. The United States comes second. 2. The British ships of the Dreadnought and Vanguard type have been the largest. The United States is building one which will eclipse all others, the battleship Delaware. She will have a displacement of 20,000 tons, 2,100 tons greater than the British Dreadnought and 750 tons more than the Vanguard. The Delaware is 510 feet long on the load water line, 85 feet 2 inches in breadth, and draws 27 feet of water.

L. D. S., Swainton, N. J. What passages in the Bible are interpreted to refer to a lower order of pre-Adamite aborigines?

We repeat that nothing is known of a race before Adam. The passages in the Bible upon which ethnologists claim to find evidence of such a race are: Gen. 1:27; Gen. 6:4; Gen. 4:16; Num. 13:33; Deut. 2:11, 20, 21; 3:11, 13; Jude 6. Milton, in Paradise Regained (Section 2:127), has the same idea expanded in poetic form, viz., that this supposed pre-Adamic race were the Gibborim or Nephilim, the descendants of fallen angels. The whole subject belongs to the domain of speculative philosophy.

Louise P., Macon, Mo. In Luke 9:33, what did Peter mean by suggesting that they make three tabernacles—one for Jesus, one for Moses and one for Elias? Was it a custom among the Jews to erect tabernacles in commemoration of important events, as they did about raising altars?

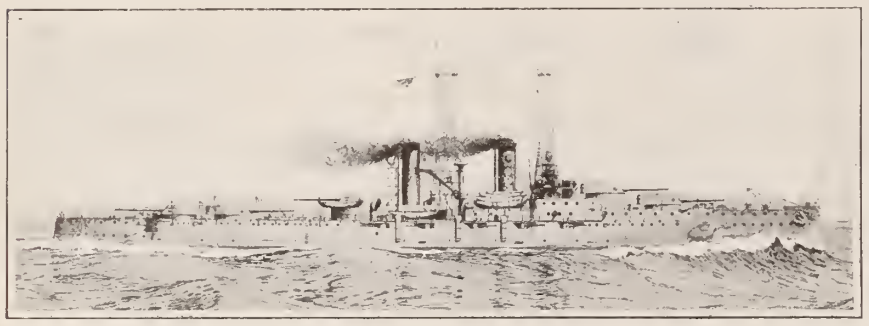
No. The explanation of Peter's words are found in the significant clause, "Not knowing what he said," which concludes the verse. He was simply confused, as Luke admits, and his words, while in such a state, have no particular meaning.

J. E. S., McDonough, Del. At what date and by what means did the apostle Peter meet his death?

Peter, according to the accepted accounts, was crucified at Rome, with his head downward. He is said by Eusebius to have suffered martyrdom along with Paul, about A. D. 67 or 68. Several other early writers refer to the event.

Mr. Charles E. Perkins, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "I notice that you are still publishing articles regarding child labor, which I think is contrary to the best interest of the country, and I am sending you, under separate cover, a sketch of the life of John S. Kennedy, which was published in last Saturday's Post. He, like very many great men in the country, went to work when he was thirteen years of age, and in his many benefactions has been a noble example of what men become who go to work early in life, instead of being put in orphan asylums, as in many cases would happen if the ideas of the child labor agitators should have their way. It would be a crime to deprive the country of such men as Andrew Carnegie, Thomas A. Edison, Nathaniel P. Banks, who was a bobbin boy before he became Governor of the State of Massachusetts, and Arthur P. Gorman, who, though working at the age of thirteen, became one of the leading Senators of the United States. There are many thousands of other examples that could be used in condemnation of the theories of these agitators."

Our correspondent is right in one sense, though wrong in another. He is right in claiming that early hardships develop strong character and self-reliance and that a very large proportion of those who have come to the front in this country have been children of poverty, who began the struggle early. It is to their everlasting honor and credit that they have done so, in the face of obstacles and disadvantages. But THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does not overlook the fact that there is another side to the child labor question. In our mills, factories, sweatshops and mines there are tens of thousands of mere children working out their little lives in hopelessness and helplessness. While here and there a bright, sturdy youth may come through this ordeal safely and develop the strength and character that assure success, what of the great majority? Ill-fed, confined in unsanitary workrooms, uneducated, and physically, mentally and intellectually stunted, how are they equipped for the battle of life? This exploiting of American children is, in our eyes, indefensible, un-Christian, uncivilized, cruel and selfish. It should be made absolutely illegal. We would ask our friend, and all who think, as he apparently does, that the hardships of these little white slaves are imaginary, to read the proceedings at the recent Chicago Child Labor Conference, and also at the White House Conference, called by the President. These men, speaking with ample knowledge and authority, expressed the true sentiment of the American people concerning the child labor evil.



The U. S. Battleship Delaware, the Largest Warship in the World

AMERICA now has the largest battleship afloat, the Delaware, which was launched recently, but which will not be completed and ready for her guns for some months to come. The Delaware is 510 feet long on the water line, is 82 feet wide and draws 27 feet of water. She will cost, when completed, over $3,000,000. Her speed will be at least 21 knots per hour.

C. B. N., Hamilton, N. Y. It has been said by a speaker that the first permanent settlements within what are now the present boundaries of the United States were under the Christian cross. Is that correct?

It is absolutely correct. The Mayflower of 1620 carried the red cross of St. George on a white ground. The white cross of Scotland was sometimes united with it, and it was under one or both of these crosses that the settlements were made. The blended crosses, with some distinctive device in the upper left hand canton, were carried until our own Stars and Stripes were adopted. So, from the earliest times, the Christian emblem has waved over our Christian settlements.

Reader, Chillicothe, O. Concerning our last Sabbath Sunday School lesson, I would like to ask if the disciples were converted before they were endued with power in the upper room? If they were, then is it essential for every one, in order to be saved, to have this second blessing? In Mr. Moody's history, it is said he had been converted and called to preach and was successful as an evangelist when two devout women told him they were praying for him that he might receive the power. What is this power? This question came up in our Sunday School class.

The apostles were certainly converted, else Jesus would not have called them to be "fishers of men." They had even received some measure of the Holy Spirit (John 20:23), but were not fully endowed until the Holy Spirit descended upon them in the upper room. Read Acts 19:1-7, concerning Paul's visit to Corinth, where he found converts who had not heard of

Pure Milk for Baby

Sanitary milk production was first started by Gail Borden in the early 50s. The best systems to-day are largely based on his methods, but none are so thorough and so rigidly enforced as the Borden system. For over fifty years the Eagle Brand Condensed Milk has proved its claim as the best food for infants.

Who Prefers Van Camp's?

Madam, you should raise your hand. All of your people like Van Camp's better than home-baked beans. Yet you have more reason to like them than they.

All people like beans that are nutty, mealy and whole. Your home-baked beans are not.

They like beans baked so that they are digestible—so they won't ferment and form gas, as do beans baked at home.

They like the tomato sauce baked into the beans.

You can't meet these requirements because you lack the facilities. You bake in dry heat.

Beans, to be digestible, must be baked in a heat of 245 degrees. That requires a steam oven.

Beans, to be delicious, must be baked without bursting—baked without crisping. You cannot do that in dry heat.

See what you gain by letting us bake for you. Your people will eat more beans—five times as many. And beans are 84 per cent nutriment.

They supply more food value than sirloin steak, and at one-third the cost. Think how they can save on your meat bills.

Then think of the time and the bother you save. Think what it means to have some meals always ready-cooked. You should vote as the rest vote, madam.

Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS

All the beans in Van Camp's cost us $2.25 per bushel. Yet beans are sold as low as 30 cents. That is another reason why Van Camp's are better than common beans.

We make our tomato sauce of whole, vine-ripened tomatoes, picked when the juice fairly sparkles. We could buy tomato sauce ready-made for exactly one-fifth what ours costs.

That's another reason why your people vote to have Van Camp's. There are millions who vote as they do.

Three sizes: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can

Mrs. E. L. A., Topeka, Kan. Why did Islam not enter Japan?

Because Japan was sealed to all the world until Commodore Perry, in 1853, secured a treaty of peace and friendship between Japan and the United States. Other treaties followed.

Mrs. J. W. W., Springfield, O. Where can I get the biography of Frances E. Willard, and to whom shall I send for recitations on temperance?

Send to Frances Pride Parks, headquarters W. C. T. U., Rest Cottage, Evanston, Ill.

V. E. B., Nacogdoches, Tex. Please give the meaning of the title words, Pippa Passes, by Browning?

Pippa was a bright, pure girl, who worked in a factory. She had a holiday, and walked abroad, singing sweetly. As she passed along wicked men and women in the houses heard her simple hut noble songs, became ashamed of their crimes, and were made better.

J. I. D., Greenville, Pa. Please tell the author and character of a book referred to by George Eliot as The Economy of Human Life?

The Economy of Human Life is supposed to be by Robert Dodsley, though it is sometimes credited to the Earl of Leicester. It was published in Duhlin, 1775. According to the title page of this edition, it is translated from an Indian manuscript, written by an ancient Brahman. Cao-tfu is said to be the name of the scholar who found this manuscript.

G. H. R., Shiremanstown, Pa. 1. Do you think it best that there should he so many denominations? Will the Church ever be one body? 2. Have the bishops a right to make rules in the Church without the consent of its members? 3. Please explain Jer. 23:1.

1. While it would unquestionably be a decided advantage if Christians could unite on a common ground of belief and action, still we do not expect any such general unity, in the near future at least. One of the principal features of our Protestantism is that it permits the greatest latitude in non-essentials. 2. There must be government in the conduct of a church's affairs, and it would be unwise to unduly criticise those who have been chosen, on account of their fitness, to direct the church's affairs. As a rule, men in such a position are the best judges of what is necessary, and it would be obviously out of place to question their methods. 3. It means precisely what it says. It is a reproof of the false shepherds, who in this case are not prophets and priests, but rulers who sought, in their government, their own selfish ends, not the good of the people ruled. Compare Ezekiel 34, which also relates to rulers.

A CHRISTIAN HERALD reader (Miss Hattie Hartwell, Prague, Okla.) sends us some stirring verses about the relief ship Bayern, chartered and loaded with food by American contributors, through this journal and other sources. We quote:

Bayern, take the fruit and bread!
God guide! before them spread
The gift of life
Prolonged; not strife,
'Tis Love's banner o'er the dead.

O Bayern of Hamburg line!
Sail on o'er the foamy brine!
Christ ever would Feed the multitude,
'Tis He makes your gift divine.

R. M. B., Hutchinson, Kan. How is snow formed?

Snow is formed by the condensation of vapor, at a temperature below 32 degrees, under normal conditions. Ten inches of snow will yield back one inch of water. Snow crystals are formed in obedience to the laws of the crystalization of water, and always present angles of 60 or 120 degrees. If the air is calm, the crystals are practically perfect. They grow from continuous condensation on a nucleus and not by agglomeration.

J. L. M., Clarence Center, N. Y. Please give the full name of King Edward of England, as he was christened; also his titles?

His baptismal names are Albert Edward. His full title is His Majesty Edward VII., King of Great Britain and Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India. He has the right to a number of minor titles, but these are seldom used. When he was proclaimed, after the death of Queen Victoria, the formula used hy the heralds was "Edward VII., by the Grace of God, King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India."

Mrs. E. J., Bellingham, Mo. Was Frances Willard a socialist? Kindly give some quotations from her upon this subject?

There are many kinds of socialists. In a sense, all Christians are socialists, since they believe in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Miss Willard spoke and wrote much, expressing the broadest belief in such fraternity. We have room for but a single quotation (from her Message to England, 1894): "We believe that one of the choicest fruits of Christianity will be the growth of a bond of brotherhood and sisterhood, so close among all nations, races and peoples, that we shall become truly kindred each to the other; and that great word Humanity, like a rolling wave of the ocean of God's love, shall wash out from the sands of time the words caste, creed, sex, and even that good word patriotism, because we shall feel that the whole world is our country and all men are our kin."

Mrs. L. G. C., Princeton, Calif. Has the Woman's Congress literature pertaining to its work? Have they a course of study? Who has charge of the Bureau of Information of the G. F. W. C.?

The Woman's Congress has no course of study, nor any literature beyond its annual reports. 2. Write to Mrs. Frank N. Shiek, corresponding secretary G. F. W. C., Wheatland, Wyo.

Mrs. G. A. Annett, Cairo, Ontario, writes: "I see by recent issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that it is something extraordinary to know any now living who went through the Crimea. I am pleased to add another to the list. My father, James McKowan, Oil Springs, Ontario, now eighty-four, was at the siege of Sebastopol and the battles of Inkerman and Alma. He still has, and prizes, his silver medal."

Forty Years of Christian Effort

THE Gospel Mission to the Tombs has just completed forty years of Christian work among the prisoners in the New York City prison. Originally founded and presided over by the late Dr. Howard Crosby, the work is now being carried on by a supervising committee, consisting of Rev. Roderick Terry, D.D., president; Rev. David G. Wylie, D.D., vice-president; William DeWitt Sterry, treasurer; Mr. Christian S. Lorentzen, secretary, and Rev. J. B. Remensnyder, D.D., Rev. Ezra S. Tipple, D.D., Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D., Rev. Henry M. Sanders, D.D., Rev. Charles A. Eaton, D.D., Rev. William Carter, D.D., and Messrs. Alexander Jay. Bruen, John Stewart and Malcolm MacLellan. The chaplain and executive officer is the Rev. George Sanderson, who gives his entire time to the work, with headquarters at the Tombs Prison. During the absence of Dr. Terry, who is now in Europe, the vice-president, Rev. Dr. Wylie, is acting president. Mr. William DeWitt Sterry, the treasurer, No. 79 Pine Street, succeeds to the office so long and faithfully filled by his father, the late George E. Sterry. Nearly 20,000 persons were committed to the Tombs last year, and among these people the mission found a good field for preaching the Gospel and doing personal work as well. The mission needs funds to carry on its work, and will welcome any assistance.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Great Theological Work*

THE New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge is not for theologians or for students of theology only. Judged by the first volume, every Christian minister and layman will find it invaluable, not merely as a work of reference on religious subjects, but as an accurate narrative and pen-picture of religious development in the past and present, and of the races, characters and creeds associated with that development. The African missions of to-day are treated with the same thoroughness as the events of Biblical times, and there is a refreshing and clarifying frankness in dealing, for instance, with "Apologetics," which ought to stimulate the timid, and cannot fail to fortify the robust, God-fearing Christian in his faith and trust in the Saviour. Rev. Henry Otis Dwight, who has no superior as an authority on foreign missions, gives a most interesting summary, in the article on "Africa," of the work of Protestant missionaries on that continent and of the difficulties with which they have to contend. While the description of what has been accomplished in winning the heathen to Christ and his gospel should be most gratifying to every friend of mission work, it is painful to learn that much of the obstruction in the missionary's path has been placed there by white settlers, selfishly opposed to anything being done to better the condition of the natives.

Every article of importance is followed by a very full list of works, to which the reader can turn for further information, and references to various authorities are incorporated with the text. The first volume fully sustains the promise of the prospectus that it will be "a conscientious, earnest and laborious attempt on the part of its editors to furnish a complete work of reference upon religion, in history, life and thought, fully abreast of the times, and written in a wholly unprejudiced and evangelical spirit."

The Two Glasses†

By permission of Ella Wheeler Wilcox

THERE sat two glasses filled to the brim,
On a rich man's table, rim to rim.
One was ruddy and red as blood,
And one was clear as the crystal flood.

Said the Glass of Wine to his paler brother,
"Let us tell tales of the past to each other;
I can tell of banquet, and revel, and mirth,
Where I was king, for I ruled in might;
For the proudest and grandest souls on earth
Fell under my touch, as though struck with blight.
From the heads of kings I have torn the crown;
From the heights of fame I have hurled men down.
I have blasted many an honored name;
I have taken virtue and given shame;
I have tempted the youth with a sip, a taste,
That has made his future a barren waste.
Far greater than any king am I,
Or than any army beneath the sky.
I have made the arm of the driver fail,
And sent the train from the iron rail.
I have made good ships go down at sea,
And the shrieks of the lost were sweet to me.
Fame, strength, wealth, genius before me fall;
And my might and power are over all!
Ho, ho! pale brother," said the Wine.
"Can you boast of deeds as great as mine?"

Said the Water Glass: "I cannot boast
Of a king dethroned, or a murdered host,
But I can tell of hearts that were sad
By my crystal drops made bright and glad;
Of thirsts I have quenched, and brows I have laved;
Of hands I have cooled, and souls I have saved.
I have leaped through the valley, dashed down the mountain,
Slept in the sunshine, and dripped from the fountain.
I have hurst my cloud fetters, and dropped from the sky,
And everywhere gladdened the prospect and eye;
I have eased the hot forehead of fever and pain;
I have made the parched meadows grow fertile with grain.
I can tell of the powerful wheel of the mill,
That ground out the flour, and turned at my will.
I can tell of manhood debased by you
That I have uplifted and crowned anew;
I cheer, I help, I strengthen and aid;
I gladden the heart of man and maid;
I set the wine-chained captive free,
And all are better for knowing me."

These are the tales they told each other,
The Glass of Wine and its paler brother,
As they sat together, filled to the brim,
On a rich man's table, rim to rim.

HIT THE SPOT

Postum Knocked Out Coffee Ails.

There's a good deal of satisfaction and comfort to hitting upon the right thing to rid one of the varied and constant ailments caused by coffee drinking.

"Ever since I can remember," writes an Ind. woman, "my father has been a lover of his coffee, but the continued use of it so affected his stomach that he could hardly eat at times.

"Mother had coffee-headache and dizziness, and if I drank coffee for breakfast I would taste it all day and usually go to bed with a headache.

"One day father brought home a pkg. of Postum recommended by our grocer. Mother made it according to directions on the box and it just "hit the spot." It has a dark seal-brown color, changing to golden brown when cream is added, and a snappy taste similar to mild, high-grade coffee, and we found that its continued use speedily put an end to all our coffee ills.

"That was at least ten years ago and Postum has, from that day to this, been a standing order of father's grocery bill.

"When I married, my husband was a great coffee drinker, altho he admitted that it hurt him. When I mentioned Postum he said he did not like the taste of it. I told him I could make it taste all right. He smiled and said, try it. The result was a success, and he wont have anything but Postum." "There's a Reason."

The Watch and Its Case

A CLERGYMAN once sought to teach some children that the soul would live after they were all dead. They listened, but evidently did not understand. Taking out his watch, he said:

"James, what is this I hold in my hand?"

"A watch, sir."

"How do you know it is a watch?"

"Because we see it and hear it tick."

"Very good."

He then took off the case, and held it in one hand, and the watch in the other. "Now, children, which is the watch? You see there are two, which look like watches. Now I will lay the case aside, put it away down here in my hat. Now, let us see if you can hear the watch ticking."

"Yes, sir, we hear it," exclaimed several voices.

"Well, the watch can tick, go and keep time, as you see, when the case is taken off and put in my hat, just as well. So it is with you, children. Your body is nothing hut the case; the body may be taken off and buried in the ground, and the soul will live just as well as this watch will go when the case is taken off."

We refer to catalog houses, selling for cash, and claiming to undersell us. Get our goods on trial. If you don't find that we undersell everyone else, simply send our goods back. Ask others to send goods on approval, as we do, and keep those which cost the least.

CAPITAL $7,000,000

This is the largest concern of its kind in existence. Our combined capital is $7,000,000. We have 450,000 customers. Our mail order buildings cover six acres of ground. In addition, we own 25 mammoth retail stores, in the heart of the largest cities, where we meet the fiercest competition in America. The only way in which we have grown to this size is by underselling all competition. Now we dominate the field. We control the output of scores of factories, and our enormous buying power enables us to practically fix our own costs. It would bankrupt any lesser concern to attempt to meet our prices.

You may pay cash if you want to, but we have no discount for cash. You may as well buy on credit, as half of the world is doing. You gain nothing by paying cash.

The Soul's Bread*

IN Drummond's wonderful book, Natural Law in the Spiritual World, he shows us how important it is that man should work for his daily bread. "Nature gives him corn, but he must grind it. She elaborates coal, but he must dig for it. So with truth [the bread of the soul]. He cannot use it as it stands. He must work, think, separate, dissolve, absorb, digest." He warns us against becoming "the listless, useless, pampered parasite of the pew—hanging admiringly upon the lips of eloquence, his character untouched, his will unbraced, his crude soul unquickened—a mere consumer, with an interest in religion purely parasitic."

Drummond accounts in this way for the spectacle which is constantly presented to us of large and influential congregations, ministered to by men of eminent learning and earnestness, which yet do little or nothing in the line of those special activities for which all churches exist. It is a pity!

The right kind of preaching is that which does more than entertain. It should rouse to action, to the salvation of souls. A man once said of Maltbie Babcock: "He was the only preacher I ever heard who made me ashamed of myself and anxious to be a better Christian."

"The only man!" Yet he who pretends to deal the bread of life to his congregation, though he may be counted the most thrilling of preachers, is really giving them only husks, unless the men and women whom he weekly feeds grow stronger constantly, and are nerved to more effective work in the Master's vineyard.

Mr. Charles McKinley, in his Educational Evangelism, throws out many hints concerning the nutriment which the pastor should deal to his flock. He says: "There is hardly a greater homiletic mistake than to suppose that the best thought of a mature mind, presented in the most effective way to reach earnest men, is not the proper food for the youth. Children's sermons may be very well for children now and then, but they are an abomination to boys in long trousers; what they need is the preacher's best thought, put in his most businesslike way."

This is the same view which Walter Scott takes of story-writing. He deplores the "condescending" tone which is usually assumed, when a writer is avowedly preparing a work for children. He considers it as distinctly enervating to both writer and reader.

In another sense, God gives us vital force, through the events of every day. This is well. We quarrel with our lot, and long to escape its woes; but strong and noble character is formed seldom outside of the crucible of sorrow.

Poor vaunt of life, indeed,
Were man but formed to feed
On joy, to solely seek and find and feast;
Such feasting ended, then
As sure an end to men;
Irks care the crop-full bird? Frets doubt the maw-crammed beast?

Then welcome each rebuff
That turns earth's smoothness rough,
Each sting, that bids not sit nor stand, but go!
Be our joys three parts pain!
Strive and hold cheap the strain;
Learn, nor account the pang; dare, never grudge the throe.

Our Lord knows what we have need of. He feeds us as we kneel to him in our closets. He deals out to us the bread of life as we sit in his sanctuary. By every dispensation of his providence, he is strengthening us, as though with food, for better work in his service. Especially does he nourish our souls, when he gives us the bitter bread of pain.

Life Lessons from the Psalms*

IF we were deprived of the whole Bible, excepting the Psalms, it is said that mankind could still, out of that wonderful book, construct a noble religion, by which our lives could be guided in the paths of peace and holiness.

Observe the clear and decided manner in which virtue and its rewards are described, and are distinguished categorically from sin. The good man is godly; that is, he worships God; he does not consort with sinners; he is not scornful; he worketh righteousness and speaketh the truth in his heart; he backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbor, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbor; he putteth not out his money to usury, nor doth he exact usury.

The ungodly man is not so; his mouth is full of cursing and deceit and fraud; he murders the innocent; he lieth in wait to catch the poor, and draweth him into his net; he imagines that he can elude God; he is proud and a flatterer, and blesseth the covetous; he bendeth his bow in order that he may shoot at the upright in heart.

And so it goes on, until almost every phase of goodness and of evil is fully made plain.

But its moral teaching, explicit and correct though it is, is the least of the lore of the Psalms. Its poetry, lifted high above almost all other, distinguishes it forever. It is essentially a poetry of praise. Its present Hebrew name, Tehillim, signifies "Praises"; and its sounding ascriptions of glory to Jehovah have served as a model for all the pæans of later ages. The Hebrew ideal of poetry has always been full of music, true to the canons of literary art, and dignified to severity. No psalms were admitted to this book which did not pass the hard test of the priestly authorities, and especially of David, who is supposed by some authorities to have left the collection in its present form, though it was probably done by Ezra.

Talmudic traditions tell us that ten other authors, besides the "sweet singer of Israel," are represented in this anthology. They are Adam, Melchizedek, Abraham, Moses, Heman, Jeduthun, Asaph and the three sons of Korah. The great ninetieth Psalm, the favorite of Lincoln, has been generally attributed to Moses, and we may reasonably conclude that he really wrote it.

Basil the Great pronounced the following eulogy upon this wonderful book: "In it is found a perfect theology: prophecy of Christ's sojourn in the flesh; threatening of judgment; hope of resurrection; fear of retribution; promises of glory; revelations of mysteries—all things are treasured in the book of Psalms, as in some great and common storehouse."

Augustine, when dying, had the seven penitential Psalms painted on the walls of his chamber, so that, looking toward them, he might resist any temptations of the evil one.

Are you feeling a lack of faith? Do you long to realize the presence of God? Read the last half of the 77th Psalm, the first part of the 115th, the 147th, the 136th.

Are you inclined to talk too much? Read Ps. 141:3. Are you quarrelsome? Read Psalm 133. Are you melancholy? Read Psalm 126 and 119:71. Are you inclined to be stingy? Read Ps. 112:5 and 9. Are you fretting over your poverty? Read Ps. 107:41 and 37:3. Whatever your case, this inspired book, written for all time, contains the right medicine for your soul.

SAPOLIO Is like a good temper, "It sheds a brightness everywhere."

Philip and the Ethiopian

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE early Christians understood their vocation; wherever they went, they preached the Gospel, whether they were recognized apostles or not. Those who were thrust out from Jerusalem for preaching the Gospel there "went everywhere preaching the Word."

"And the angel of the Lord spake unto Philip, saying, Arise, and go toward the south, unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem, unto Gaza, which is desert." What! in the very spring-tide of this great awakening, must God's chosen instrument be withdrawn? Yes, even so; for God's thoughts are not our thoughts, neither are our ways his; the thoughts of God are infinitely higher than ours (Isa. 55:8, 9). Philip was not indispensable to God: he was only what God had made him, and what God can make any man to be who surrenders himself to him. It was necessary for the converts, who had now themselves received the Holy Ghost, to become independent of Philip, or of any other man; it was also necessary for Philip to learn that, as an instrument of the Holy Ghost, he must be equally willing to do great things or small, and be willing not to work according to any ideas of his own, but simply to fall into God's plans, whatever they might be. Already, we see, he had learned to be quiet enough before God to have an attentive ear for all that God would say to him.

It was not long before the Lord showed him the object of this journey. Probably Philip was in prayer; very likely he was thinking much of his late converts, and commending one and another to God, not worried because time seemed to be lost, or because his powers of preaching were being wasted, for Philip's time was God's, and any power he possessed was God's property, and not his. An Ethiopian eunuch, a man of high position, was just on his return journey from Jerusalem, where he had been to worship. Philip was not occupied with thoughts of curiosity as to who this man was, where he came from, what brought him there, etc., or he would never have been free enough in spirit to hear the still, small voice saying to him, "Go near, and join thyself to this chariot." He did hear, and he did obey. "Philip ran thither to him, and heard him, and said, Understandest thou what thou readest?"

Why do we so often fail to hear and to understand the voice of the Spirit of God? Is it not because we are preoccupied? Perhaps we are making our own plans, and then God's plans come in as an interference with ours. Perhaps we are distracted, letting our thoughts wander in every direction, and thus we miss the "still, small voice." The spirit which hears the voice of God most distinctly is that one which is in such complete submission to his will, and has such confidence in his love and wisdom, as to believe that "all things work together for good to them that love God" (Rom. 8:28), and which is, therefore, open to receive anything which God may say.

Weeks, months before this time, the eunuch may have been awakened; it is possible that some zealous Jew who traded with Ethiopia had come to court, and had spoken something of the true and living God. It may be that he had said that copies of the Scriptures were to be obtained which could tell of this great God. The man, tired of the absurdities of his heathenism, may have come to Jerusalem, hearing from some Jew that that was the only place where the true God could be worshiped, and may have there obtained the portion of the Scriptures which he was reading when Philip abruptly broke in upon him with the question, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" Abrupt as it was, the question was a welcome one to this honest inquirer.

A Good Living From Poultry on a City Lot

On this Lot about 60 Breeding Hens are kept and an average of 250 chickens

BABY CHICKENS, EGGS FOR SETTING AND CHICKENS OF ALL AGES ARE SHIPPED WEEKLY. AT THE PRESENT RATE OF SALES THE NET INCOME WILL EXCEED $1,500.00 BEFORE THE END OF THE YEAR. THESE WONDERFUL RETURNS ARE MADE POSSIBLE BY THE USE OF THE

PHILO SYSTEM

WHICH IS ESPECIALLY VALUABLE TO THE FARMER AS WELL AS THE CITY OR VILLAGE FANCIER, AND IS ADAPTED TO ALL CLIMATES, ALL BREEDS AND ALL PEOPLE

THE PHILO SYSTEM IS UNLIKE ALL OTHER WAYS OF KEEPING POULTRY

And in many respects is just the reverse, accomplishing things in poultry work that have always been considered impossible and getting unheard of results that are hard to believe without seeing. However, the facts remain the same and we can prove to you during the next three months every word of the above statement.

THE NEW SYSTEM COVERS ALL BRANCHES OF THE WORK NECESSARY FOR SUCCESS

From selecting the breeders to marketing the product. It tells how to get eggs that will hatch, how to hatch nearly every egg and how to raise nearly all the chicks hatched. It gives complete plans in detail how to make everything necessary to run the business and at less than half the cost required to handle the poultry business in any other manner. There is nothing complicated about the work and any man, woman or child that can handle a saw and hammer can do the work.

TWO-POUND BROILERS IN EIGHT WEEKS

Are raised in a space of less than a square foot to the broiler without any loss and the broilers are of the very best quality, bringing, here, three cents per pound above the highest market price.

OUR SIX-MONTHS-OLD PULLETS ARE LAYING AT THE RATE OF 24 EGGS EACH PER MONTH

In a space of two square feet for each bird. No green cut bone or meat of any description is fed, and the food is inexpensive as compared with food others are using.

Our new book, THE PHILO-SYSTEM OF PROGRESSIVE POULTRY KEEPING, gives full particulars regarding these wonderful discoveries, with simple, easy-to-understand directions that are right to the point, and fifteen pages of illustrations showing all branches of the work from start to finish.

It also tells how to make a brooder for twenty-five cents that will automatically keep all lice off the chickens or kill any that may be on them when in the brooders.

"A TRICK OF THE TRADE"

Fully one-third of all the chickens ready to hatch die in the shell. After thirty years of study and practice we have discovered a simple way to save every chick that is fully developed and ready to hatch whether the egg is pipped or not. This, we believe, is one of the lost arts of the ancient Egyptians. It takes but a minute to save a chick and no skill is required.

OUR NEW BROODER SAVES TWO CENTS ON EACH CHICKEN

No lamp is required. No danger of chilling, overheating or burning up the chickens as with brooders using lamps or any kind of fire. They also keep all lice off the chickens automatically, or kill any that may be on them when placed in the brooder. Our book gives full plans and the right to make and use them. One can easily be made in an hour at a cost of from 25 to 50 cents.

Valley Falls, N. Y., Sept. 5, 1907.

It was my privilege to spend a week in Elmira during August, during which time I saw the practical working of the Philo System of Keeping Poultry, and was surprised at the results accomplished in a small corner of a city yard. "Seeing is believing," they say, and if I had not seen, it would have been hard to believe that such results could have followed so small an outlay of space, time and money. (Rev.) W. W. Cox.

Oct. 22, 1908.

P. S.—A years observation, and some experience of my own, confirm me in what I wrote Sept. 5, 1907. The System has been tried so long and by so many, that there can be no doubt as to its worth and adaptability. It is especially valuable to parties having but a small place for chickens; seven feet square is plenty for a flock of seven. (Rev.) W. W. Cox.

Ransomville, N. Y., Dec. 5, 1908.

Dear Sir:—Last spring we purchased your book entitled the "Philo System" and used your heatless brooders last spring and summer. The same has been a great help to us in raising the chix in the health and mortality. The chix being stronger and healthier than those raised in the brooders with supplied heat. We believe this brooder is the best thing out yet for raising chix successfully. We put 25,000 chix through your heatless brooders this last season and expect to use it more completely this coming season. We have had some of the most noted poultrymen from all over the U. S. here, also a large amount of visitors who come daily to our plant and without any exception they pronounce our stock the finest and healthiest they have seen anywhere this year.

Yours truly, W. R. Curtis & Co.

Questions and Answers

Subscriber, Boston. What is it they say when the children at Mont-Lawn give their "allegiance to the Flag"? What are the words?

"I pledge allegiance to my flag, and to the republic for which it stands, one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

W. G. M., London, Ontario. Has the bison, or buffalo, in any country been domesticated so that it takes the place of a horse or other beast of burden?

The American bison has never been used for domestic purposes, and even when kept in private parks for years they do not seem to become tame. The buffalo of other countries has been domesticated, as in India; but it really has a closer resemblance to the ox than to the bison in America. The latter, strictly speaking, seems to have no foreign equivalent.

E. H. K., North Carolina. How and when is the time-ball dropped at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich?

The time-ball is dropped automatically down a high pole at the observatory at Greenwich, England, at noon, the moment of the passage of the sun over the meridian of Greenwich. The time-ball is used in several American cities, the ball being dropped by a current from Washington, for the eastern time division. Here the ball drops down a wire set a little distance from the pole. We never heard of the type of bridge mentioned in your other question.

M. B. C., New York, writes: "Don't you think that Mr. Taft, in his recent very complimentary speech extolling the 'maiden aunts' and the state of feminine single blessedness generally, merely intended it as a kind of joke on Mr. Roosevelt? He is so fond of fun. By the way, I like his attitude on the liquor question. At a dinner at Hot Springs, Mr. Taft turned his glass down, and being asked about it, he said: 'Yes, and it's going to stay down.' He knows that the President should have a clear brain, firm nerves and unimpaired powers to perform his duties aright."

The President-elect did well in turning his glass, and the country is to be congratulated on an Executive who is a practical temperance advocate. Many a public man has marred, if not ruined, his career by yielding to conviviality. Many a rash utterance has been inspired by drink. With respect to the "maiden aunt" speech, it may be that Mr. Taft did wish to emphasize his non-support of the anti-race-suicide theory, but it was done in a kindly fashion and has no special significance.

A. S. E., Hamilton, Bermuda. Give the number of victims killed by earthquakes during the last century.

The following is the list of the most important earthquakes, before the Italian disaster, since 1800, with the number killed: 1812, Venezuela, killed 20,000; 1822, Aleppo, killed 20,000; 1867, Peru and Ecuador, killed 25,000; 1888, Island of Krakatoa, 50,000; 1893, Persia, killed 12,000; Japan, 1896, 35,000; 1902, St. Pierre, Martinique, 25,000; 1905, Northern India, 19,000.

Inquirer, Bethlehem, Pa. 1. Is it dangerous for a lady, sixty years old, troubled with dyspepsia and indigestion, to cross the ocean in June? 2. Is there much difference between the cost or comfort of first and second-class passage?

1. It is safe, and might be salutary for you to cross the ocean. June is one of the best months for the voyage. Take with you remedies and special food for any constitutional weaknesses. A light diet, with some gentle cathartic, just before sailing, reduces the likelihood of the seasickness of which you are evidently afraid. 2. Write for different prices, on the different lines, to Thomas Cook & Son, 245 Broadway, New York City.

D. C. M., Jacksonburg, W. Va. What hoisting machines were used in building Solomon's Temple; also in building the Tower of Babel?

Probably no hoisting machines were used, in the modern sense of the term. The design of the temple was such that no material had to be lifted to any great height. A rope, with hundreds of men for power, was probably the only method employed. The Tower of Babel was probably built on a system of inclined planes, and the material could be carried up on the backs of laborers or be driven around the circular roadway.

Miss L. E. J., Winchester, Ky. Is Charlotte, by Susannah Rowson (1794), the same tale as Charlotte Temple, or has it been rewritten? Has Charlotte Temple a sequel? In what churchyard in New York is Charlotte Temple buried?

Charlotte Temple is simply, so far as available statistics go, the same tale as Charlotte. It was written not in 1794, but in 1790, and was founded on the story of Charlotte Stanley and Colonel John Montressor, the "Montraville" of the story. She is buried in Trinity Churchyard, New York. "Charlotte Stanley" was first engraven on her tombstone. It has been changed to "Charlotte Temple." The first edition consisted of 25,000 copies. Innumerable editions have since appeared. The sequel is called Charlotte's Daughter; or, The Three Orphans.

E. A. L., Brookline, Mass. What is the reason for the sun's continuing to rise later in the morning after the days begin to lengthen, after December 21, even up to January 7, though the sun sets enough later to make the days longer?

The sun does not rise later. The almanac makers are not always careful of their statements; nor do they give exact minutes nor fractions of minutes. The days lengthen at both ends. Should the sun seem to be late in rising, it is on account of some condition of the atmosphere. SAMUEL PHELPS LELAND.

C. H. D., Fall River, Mass. What is the nature and appearance of radium?

Radium is an element found principally in pitchblende in Northern Bohemia. Only a few grains are found to the ton. It is probable, however, that it is widely distributed among other substances beside pitchblende, but in minute quantities. The process of separation is long and tedious. The element has not been isolated, probably, in an absolutely pure state. Of its compounds the bromide and chloride are best known. The color of the flame is red, and it forms an insoluble sulphate and carbonate.

Old Subscriber, Menetta, O. 1. What induced Cardinal Newman to write "Lead, Kindly Light"? 2. Did John Milton write Paradise Lost? Where can I get his life?

1. Cardinal Newman's beautiful hymn was the outcome of a long and painful mental and spiritual struggle. In June, 1833, he was sailing on the Mediterranean, convalescing from malarial fever, "aching" to be home, and uncertain as to his future, but trusting in God to show the way. 2. Yes. R. A. F., Anglin, Wash. How can we interest a dancing and card-playing community, thirty miles from town, in a Sunday School and church?

Can you not devise evening entertainments to attract the people—refined colloquies, recitations, music, readings—enlisting the children from influential families to help? During the entertainments, urge the ends in view, and show their value. Of course there must be good, spirited Gospel teaching and preaching to hold the people, after you have succeeded in attracting them.

E. H., Delaware, N. Y. Why are Jerusalem and Bethlehem called the cities of David?

Because David was born in Bethlehem B.C. 1085, and he made Jerusalem his capital after overcoming the Jebusites.

An old subscriber in Cambria, Calif., whose heart has been deeply touched by the accounts of the suffering in Italy, as the result of the great earthquake, sends us this letter, which is so overflowing with Christlike sympathy and love for others that we give it here in full:

"DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: I am an aged widow, with no income, and have no money to send to aid the stricken people, who have my heartfelt sympathy; but I think that I can spare 100 pounds (or more) of my little stock of goods, if it would be all right for me to send them C. O. D. to you. I am living up in the mountain district, and the roads between here and Cambria are entirely gone, so that it may be several weeks before a wagon can pass over the route. Supplies have now to be carried by pack-horses. I can send the sufferers: Four dress waists, one woolen hood, one-half dozen handkerchiefs, small coat, baby quilt, ladies' mittens, one platter and six plates, three cups and saucers, two bowls, two pickle dishes, six tablespoons, several pounds of dried fruit, apples, pears and prunes, one pair man's shoes (almost new), three underwaists (ladies'), one pair spectacles, some sweet corn and pumpkin seed, some things to please little ones, and perhaps several other articles, when packing box."

There are many difficulties in the way which prevent acceptance of this most gracious offering by our dear old friend, but the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in recognition of her golden-hearted generosity, has himself placed $20 in the Relief Fund in her name, in order that she may be represented with others in the great work of humanity now going on in Sicily and Calabria. We thank her most heartily for her kindly offer, and trust her example will be an inspiration to many others.

R. H., Indian Orchard, Mass. What is the significance of the word Idaho?

It comes from the Indian Idah-hoe, meaning "Light on the mountains."

The cities are still under separate governments, though the question of their union under one government has been frequently agitated.

Montreal's Fairy Palace of Ice

VISITORS from all over the United States are attracted to Montreal and Quebec in January and February to enjoy the winter sports which are found at their best in Canada. The Ice Palace at Montreal this year is a magnificent structure with towers, turrets and archways made of blocks of glistening ice. The blocks freeze together and for a time make quite a strong structure. When lights are thrown on the building it is a picture from fairyland. The dryness of the atmosphere in Canada enables people to go out even when the thermometer is well below zero mark, and enjoy the tobogganing, trips on snowshoes, and games of ice hockey, that make the entire winter season a winter carnival. The picturesque costumes worn add much to the interest of the winter landscape.

THE INAUGURATION PROGRAMME

At the Capital of the Nation, When William Howard Taft and James S. Sherman Are Sworn Into Office

By ABBY G. BAKER

TO-MORROW, Thursday, March 4, when Taft and Sherman are inducted into the two highest offices within the gift of the American people, Washington, the capital of the nation, will witness the greatest inauguration of her history. Many weeks ago President-elect Taft met the leading chairmen of the Inaugural Committee, and discussed the plans for the fourth of March, and from that day to this the committee—composed of the leading business men of the city and country, and who are expert executives—have worked unceasingly to make it just what the President-elect wants it to be, the ideal inauguration.

For the rest of this week, and especially to-morrow and to-morrow night, the city will be a blaze of "Old Glory" and bunting while the daylight lasts, and a marvelous display of electric lighting after nightfall. Weeks ago the Inaugural Committee urged the citizens to prepare to decorate their residences, and to-day the red, white and blue is waving from the windows of hundreds of private houses in the residential section, and the committee did not neglect its part in decorating the line of march of the parade. Green and white were selected as the official colors of the Inaugural Committee, and they vie with the Stars and Stripes in the general decorations. Pennsylvania Avenue, down which so many historic processions have passed, is a veritable bower of flags and bunting from the Capitol to the Court of Honor, and when the glittering host sweeps down its length, it will be a sight worth crossing the continent to see.

One of the things which will make this the inauguration noteworthy is the delightful relations existing between the out-going and in-coming chief executives and their families. When President-elect and Mrs. Taft returned to Washington last month, after their trip to Panama and their short stay in their old home at Cincinnati, they were entertained for a few days by their close friend, Miss Mabel Boardman, of the American National Red Cross, and then they went to the White House as the guests of President and Mrs. Roosevelt. On the morning of Inauguration Day at ten o'clock the President and the President-elect will leave the south door of the mansion together and be driven, in an open barouche drawn by four high-spirited bays, to the Capitol, where the inauguration ceremonies take place. The other members of the Presidential families will avoid publicity by driving to the Capitol on some of the side streets, and Mrs. Taft and her children will occupy the front seat in the members' gallery of the Senate Chamber for part of the ceremonial, while the Vice-President takes the oath of office. At the close of President Taft's inauguration address, which is given on the platform at the east of the Capitol, with his family and a large party of personal friends he will return to the White House, where Mrs. Roosevelt will preside for the last time, and where she will be the gracious hostess of a luncheon in their honor.

In going to the Capitol in the morning Mr. Taft has selected Troop A, of Cleveland, as his personal escort.

The Troop comprises sixty-two men and four officers, who will wear hussar uniforms and be commanded by Captain W. M. Scofield. He will also be accompanied by an escort of honor composed of the Grand Army of the Republic organizations of Washington, the Union Veteran League, Spanish War Veterans, and the Army and Navy Union. Upon reaching the Capitol he will proceed at once to the Senate Chamber, where Vice-President-elect Sherman will have preceded him, and where will be found the most notable group of distinguished men this country could produce. In a semicircle in front of the presiding officer's desk will be seated President Roosevelt, President-elect Taft, the Committee from Congress who accompanied them from the White House to the Capitol, and the members of the Cabinet. In the row back of them will be the Ambassadors and Ministers Plenipotentiary from all the foreign governments represented at Washington, in the gold lace and glittering decorations of their full court dress. Back of them will be the members of the Senate, the governors of the States, General J. Franklin Bell, chief of staff of the Army and commander of the military force of the inauguration, with a dozen of the leading army officers, the Admiral of the Navy, with his staff, and crowded in the back of the chamber will be many other distinguished visitors, with the three hundred and eighty members and Speaker of the House of Representatives. Every available inch of space in the galleries will be packed and jammed with people

"The Hallowed Hypocrisies of Life"

TEXT—Ezek. 24 : 18

THE story is told by the prophet himself. He says that it was on the tenth day of the tenth month in the ninth year of his exile—one understands the particularity with which the grief-stricken man chronicles the day and hour—that the wife of his youth, the wife so tenderly loved, she whom he called the "desire of his eyes," was taken from him at a stroke, the suddenness of the visitation leaving little time for the sadness of farewells. And with this stroke came a strange, an incredible command. "Thou shalt neither mourn nor weep, neither shall thy tears run down. Sigh, but not aloud. Make no mourning for the dead." He was not to uncover his head nor sprinkle ashes upon it. He was not to go barefoot and with covered lips, after the manner of the mourners of his day and country, neither was he to eat the funeral baked meats which men sent to the homes of the bereaved in token of commiseration. No, but he was to go about his ordinary tasks in ordinary attire, omitting every sign of mourning and showing no respect for the memory of his beloved dead. It was a command inexpressibly bitter; but he obeyed. "So I spake unto the people in the morning; and at even my wife died: and I did in the morning as I was commanded."

The people knew him. They knew that his young wife had been the desire of his years. They knew that she had been taken from him at a stroke. They were astonished when they beheld his outward calm, saw on his man's cheek no tear, and on his brow no cloud. They were astonished, and they were appalled. But they felt that the prophet had a message for them, and that this act was in some strange, sad way an acted parable for them. "Wilt thou not tell us," they entreated, "what these things are to us, that thou doest so?" And he told them. They were exiles in a strange land, and far away Jerusalem, the city of the great king; Jerusalem, beloved and holy, the desire of their eyes, was even then in the hands of a ruthless foe. The king of Babylon had gathered his forces for a final dash upon Jerusalem, and the doom of the great city was sealed. It was their city that was besieged and was about to be destroyed. It was their kinsfolk who were perishing. Their sons and their daughters were falling by the sword. It was their own national life which was at its death-gasp. The glory of the Lord was passing away. Yet there was no breath of added sorrow in the air. There was no sign of mourning in their walk. Though the pride of their power, the desire of their eyes, and that for which their souls yearned was to be taken away from them at a stroke, they mourned not, neither did they weep for the iniquities which had brought upon them an irreparable doom.

Hopes and Disappointments

It was for their sake, then, that Ezekiel braced himself to go about his daily work as though there was no agony in his soul. His spirit was bowed to the dust; but for their good he hid his sorrow behind a quiet self-control. He would not indulge himself in the luxury of grief. He must think of those whose eternal interests were in his care. He could not afford to weep. For the sake of men and women round about him he must be strong and smile though his heart was breaking. These are the hallowed hypocrisies of life, and without them life would be poor indeed!

Every public teacher has to do at times as Ezekiel did. Every preacher knows the heart-pang and the strain. Life is hard enough for most people in this world. The strife of the market, the battle of the streets, the daily struggle for bread or fame, the competition of men and nations grows no lighter as the years go on. High resolve in the morning, struggle at noon, disappointment at night, and energy and hope returning with the dawning of the morning and the conflict manfully renewed, with defeat and victory hanging in the balance—who does not know the daily round of city life? The cares of home, the thousand trivial incidents that constitute the wear and tear of a woman's life, a mother's unresting vigilance while the little ones fight their way through infancy and childhood to the health and strength to which she alone can bring them, the daily task for which daily strength must be sought and found, and all the chances and changes which make up the burden of our days—the story is old and commonplace. People come to church expecting—they have a right to expect—that they find comfort, encouragement, and inspiration. They may be wrong if they look for learning always, eloquence always, literary finish and power and beauty always. It is too much to demand, and they are unjust in their exaction. But these they have a right to expect—comfort in sorrow, encouragement in defeat, and the inspiration of a great faith. They have a right to expect them—and from whom?

The Source of Comfort

From the Spirit of the living God using the preacher and speaking through him. Yet is he not human, too? Has he not his cares? Are the daily anxieties of life unknown to him? Bodily weakness, mental distress, and the hope deferred which makes the heart sick—do you dream that he is exempt from them? He is not entitled to any of these things. He has no right to them. When he took upon himself the office of preacher he gave hostages to fortune, and pledged his honor not to be sorrowful, not to be doleful, not to look on the dark side of things, not to admit that there is such a thing as an irremediable loss or a hopeless defeat, and never to show that he so much as knows what weakness means—in public! He must be a minister of joy, a source of gladness, an exhaustless battery of hope for the recharging of devitalized souls. The hymn we often sing—

> The dawn of God's dear Sabbath
> Breaks o'er the earth again,
> As some sweet summer morning
> After a night of pain;
> It comes as cooling showers
> To some enchanted land;
> As shade of clustered palm-trees
> 'Mid weary wastes of sand—

is one of the blessed truths of experience, God's good gift to tired and lonely souls. Yet the Sabbath morning service is largely what the preacher makes it; not altogether so, but he can darken the light which is in your souls when you come to the house of prayer, or he can add sunlight to the daylight and make the happy happier than before. But his own disappointments? His losses? His bodily weariness and spiritual depression? I say again, he is not entitled to any of these. He must not presume to indulge in such costly luxuries. His wife may know of them. His physician may be told about them. Between himself and his Saviour they remain a sacred confidence. But as the minister of eternal things to men and women who need him he must come with radiant faith into the sanctuary where they seek God to make known the saving health of his love and righteousness to every wanting heart. So he, too, calls up Ezekiel's brave smile just to cover his tears.

It is digressing from the ordered track of the sermon when I go on to add—for souls are more than subjects and we can easily resume the thread of our story—that when a minister pleads for the ministry it is not the minister for whom he pleads. The distinction is vital. A strong man would scorn to ask for your sympathy, your consideration, your gifts, sometimes even for your prayers, for himself. He would accept them gladly and gratefully if freely and cheerfully offered: ask for them he would not. But for the ministry I, at least, do not hesitate to plead. For it is for you yourselves that I am pleading. If you have made the minister feel that he is a person of little worth; if he feels that his place in your life is nothing; if he himself has been devitalized by the conflict with sin and suffering; if there has been no return current of sympathy, admiration, gratitude, and love from you to him, and if you keep him through the week busy with uncongenial tasks for which he has no aptitude, to which he has never been called, dissipating energy on a multitude of trivialities—you are the losers. You come needing his inspired and inspiring ministry, and you and the world are poorer if virtue has gone out of him. That generous and lovely character—man sometimes and woman sometimes, with man's strength always and always with a woman's tenderness—whom most churches have known and called "the minister's friend," is not only the friend of the minister, but the friend of the ministry, a benefactor of all the congregation and the unseen source through which God gives himself abundantly. The ministry is not the minister. The ministry is entrusted to all the church of God.

And the preacher is not the only Ezekiel in the world, though naturally a preacher thinks of him first. The physician of the body knows the strain even as does the physician of the soul. "So I spake unto the people in the morning; and at even my wife died: and I did in the morning as I was commanded." He must be brave in the home of sorrow, cheerful by the sick-bed, calm when danger is greatest, and in his face must be never a sign of fear. Every feature must be under control. No despair must sadden the eyes, no nervous strain set the lips a trembling. The anxiety he has left behind him in his own home and the black care that walks the rounds with him? The disturbed night, the broken sleep, the nerves raw with watching through so many anxious hours? He is a physician, and he, too, must deny himself such expensive luxuries as these. It is his glory, and through all the world, and in all the generations it has been the glory of the great profession to which he belongs, that when our frail mortality calls to him he forgets his own weakness, anxiety or pain, forgets that he is a man with a man's limitations and needs, and is only a physician, God's good gift to men.

Shall I suggest to you that these are exceptional experiences in life, born of special avocations? You would laugh at me if I did, and tell me that a minister of Christ should know more of the human nature to which he pretends to minister. No man nor woman is exempt from the law. No good man nor woman wants to be exempt from it. The general, the statesman, the judge—he must leave his own griefs or fears, and give commands, control senates, administer justice as though—as though—"I spake unto the people in the morning; and at even my wife died: and I did in the morning as I was commanded." Here is a business man carrying vast responsibilities in time of crisis. A word lightly spoken by him, a hint of fear in his eyes, a cheek that has blanched under the nerve-racking thought of "might-have-beens" or possibilities of to-morrow—and you know full well what ruin may be carried to a thousand homes as the swift servants of twentieth century science bear the secret of his weakness on the wings of the wind. He has to be brave and cheerful though deadly fear tug at his heart-strings, and seem confident while he knows not what an hour may bring forth.

The Tragedy of Mirth

Even the public entertainer knows the burden and the obligation, and I have sometimes thought that there can be no sadder existence on this earth than that of the person whose business it is to amuse. There is a story told in the life of Grimaldi, the most famous of clowns, which may be old to you. He was ill, worn out in body and in mind, and he consulted a famous physician. The doctor had not caught his name when he presented himself in his consulting room, and after many questions told his unknown patient that he needed a change, something to brace him and cheer him up, and he said: "What you want is a good hearty laugh. If I were you I should go to hear Grimaldi." And the poor man said, "Alas! I am Grimaldi." And I call to mind a song which was old when I was a child, and which I have never heard since childhood's days, about the Italian clown Punchinello, the darling of the crowd, of whom they sang—

> Bravo! bravo, Punchinello!
> He's the merriest, maddest fellow!

and the song told how night by night he had to make his grimaces and perform his antics while his wife lay dying. He must paint his face vermilion, though it seemed as though it were with his own heart's blood, and leave the quiet sick-room for the glaring, flaring circus and the hideous sawdust ring, that he might buy food and wine for her to keep body and soul together. And then the last verse, as I seem to remember it, shows us the painted, fantastic clown fortnuate enough to obtain tickets of admittance. As the galleries, when packed to a jam, will only hold about six hundred, and as two or three hundred thousand people try to secure the tickets of admission, it can easily be realized at what a premium they are held.

After the distinguished group have taken their places the Senate will be called to order by Vice-President Fairbanks. Everyone will stand and prayer will be offered by Chaplain Hale. Then, after a few minutes of routine business, Vice-President-elect Sherman will come forward on the arm of a member of the Congressional Committee and, from Vice-President Fairbanks, solemnly take the oath of office as Vice-President of the United States. Whereupon the Senate is immediately adjourned and everybody files out to the platform, which has been built at the east front of the Capitol, where Mr. Taft is to be inaugurated, and which has been constructed upon such a generous scale that it will seat seven thousand persons, and, incidentally, cost sixteen thousand dollars. But seven thousand is only a fraction of the vast mass of humanity which will surge like an army across the broad plaza facing the Capitol, which will fill its broad acres of parking, and which will be seen hanging over the roof and eaves, and from all the front windows of the great building itself. Not a hundredth part of the eager crowd can hear a word which is said, but every one can see the interesting ceremony, and that recompenses them for hours of patient waiting.

The oath of office will be administered to President Taft, upon a Bible of his own selection, by Chief Justice Fuller of the Supreme Court, and then he will deliver his inaugural address and probably outline the policies he intends to pursue. The ceremonies at the Capitol will conclude with the President's address, at about half-past one o'clock, and the Presidential party will drive rapidly down the avenue to the White House, where they will enjoy Mrs. Roosevelt's luncheon. Everybody else will get theirs where they can and then hurry to the stands where their seats are engaged, or to the windows facing the avenue which they have rented, from which to see the inaugural parade.

Pennsylvania Avenue windows have been in much demand, and some of them have brought fabulous prices. The price of rooms and board has also run up extravagantly in the past few days since the crowds began coming in—that is, in the neighborhoods touching the line of parade. Board and rooms can be had at reasonable prices if those who desire it will go out a dozen or more blocks from the centre of the town.

At two forty-five o'clock, sharp, President Taft will take his place on the reviewing stand, which is built directly in front of the north grounds of the White House, and in the centre of the Court of Honor, and the grand parade will begin. First will come the imposing military division under General Bell. A large number of States have sent military organizations, and thousands of cavalrymen, and soldiers on foot, and many batteries of field artillery, will be in line. Every regiment has brought a brass band, which will produce an almost continual roll of music along the entire route of parade. A little lesson in history will run through the line of march, for all the organized militia will be arranged in columns and placed in line according to the date of their respective States' admission into the Union.

The Navy also will be fully represented. Three thousand of the sailors, who have just made the trip around the world with our fleet, will be in line. Large companies of midshipmen from Annapolis and cadets from West Point will follow the older troops, and almost all the large military educational institutions in the country will send their military organizations to represent them. Many governors of the States, with their staffs, will ride at the head of their respective National Guards. Governor Hughes will thus honor the National Guard of New York, and the Republican Club of New York City is to give him a reception at one of the city hotels some time to-morrow. Governor Crothers, of Maryland, will bring three mounted regiments, and

Mr. J. B. Larner | General Franklin Bell | Chairman E. J. Stillwagen

Men in Charge of the Inaugural

Pennsylvania's National Guard has sent three thousand men.

Hundreds of political clubs are in the city ready to take their places in line, and each has some distinctive feature of dress or uniform. The Republican County Committee of New York are here a thousand strong, and they will march in dark overcoats, high silk hats and dark trousers. The Georgia Taft Club, an organization representing the new Republican element of the South, is here with an immense brass band, and is awakening no end of enthusiasm playing "Dixie" and other Southland melodies. Indeed, the South has never been so well represented at an inauguration since the Civil War as it will be to-morrow.

Until the last glimmer of daylight has faded the great procession will still be passing the reviewing stand, but as the last line of marchers leaves the Court of Honor, that handsome colonnade of pillars, flags, pennants and flowers extending from Fifteenth to Seventeenth Street in front of the White House, the President and his party will hurry from the stand, through the front yard and into the White House for a brief respite before the gayeties of the night begin. The thousands of citizens and visitors who have thronged the streets and the stands all day will also hasten home, or to their boarding places, for hasty dinners. Everybody will be in a hurry, for everybody will want to be back in the streets or down at the White Lot to see the marvelous fireworks. These are to begin at seven-thirty, so that those who are going to the Inaugural reception may have an opportunity to see them too.

It is said by Mr. Cuno H. Rudolph, chairman of the inauguration fireworks committee, that there never has been seen in this country such a display of fireworks as will be exhibited on the White Lot. The well-known pyrotechnic artist Pain will give the exhibit, and it will include patriotic, political, scenic and comic features. The Star Spangled Banner will be unfurled in fire a thousand feet high; the President's salute of twenty-one aerial guns will be given. A pillar of light a hundred feet high will throw the Washington monument and all the environs into daylight brightness.

A thousand rockets will be exploded and five hundred batteries; there will be six hundred colored lights, two tons of colored fire, fifty balloons and ten thousand candles. But the most spectacular feature of all will be the "Battle of the Skies," an immense set-piece showing a typical up-to-date city, and in the distant sky airships and aeroplanes coming toward it. The exhibit will close with colossal fire portraits of the President and Vice-President, followed by the "inauguration bouquet," produced by the electrical discharge of five hundred large rockets. This will conclude the programme, but until the wee sma' hours of the morning the great public buildings will be outlined in electricity, the dome of the Capitol will stand in clear relief against the midnight sky, and huge searchlights will be throwing their rays over all parts of the city.

But for those who have paid their five dollars for the inaugural reception tickets, the Pension Office building will be the drawing point after nine o'clock. It is a dream of beauty, and under the myriads of electric bulbs it will be a fairy scene of splendor. Its bare brick walls have been covered with soft clinging fabrics and festooned with Southern smilax and flowers. Its stately pillars stand in all their glory, and the fountain in the centre of the great hall has been converted into a grotto of beauty. The President and his party will arrive between nine and ten o'clock, and about an hour later will make the grand round of the stately apartment. The brains, wit, beauty and wealth of the country will be represented there, and with the entrancing music of the Marine Band, the gorgeous gowns of the women, the resplendent court costumes of the diplomatists, the hum of voices, the thousands of happy faces of those who have come to greet the Chief Magistrates and their gracious wives, will make a scene surpassing that of the Arabian Nights.

The inaugural concerts are to be given there in the Pension building on Friday morning, afternoon and evening, and on Saturday night, by Professor Percy Foster's magnificent chorus of five hundred voices. He is to be assisted by the Marine Band and the Constabulary Band of Manila.

back again in his sordid garret, kneeling by the dead body of his wife in an agony of tears. But still, if the crowd could have seen him, doubtless they would still have howled—

> Bravo! bravo, Punchinello!
> He's the merriest, maddest fellow!

For this is the fate of those who are paid to make others laugh.

This is the deep tragedy of home. This is the woman's strength and glory, the crown of heroism which never knows itself to be heroic, and of that true sainthood which sanctifies the humblest life. Home would be no home at all if every disturbing incident were proclaimed from the housetops. There are reticences which are truly religious, concealments which are consecrated, and pretenses which are holy unto the Lord. Weak women have risen to these heights, and in their weakness shown themselves supremely great. They have smiled when the heart was breaking. Their smiles have been put on to save and serve their dearest. In bitterness of spirit they have worn their garlands of joy, and the sackcloth which was on their souls has been transfigured by an immortal love.

Let us bless God for these hallowed hypocrisies of life in woman or in man. There are times when the most devout Christian may be as thankful as any French cynic of them all that language was given us to conceal our thoughts. You have no right to go through life with mind and soul unclothed. You insult the decencies of the heart. With Browning, the strong man is ready to exclaim—

> God be thanked, the meanest of His creatures
> Boasts two soul-sides, one to face the world with,
> One to show a woman when he loves her!

And for love's sweet sake we, like Ezekiel, can carry ourselves bravely to all our world, weeping not nor mourning, nor making change in the outer manner of our life, even though the desire of our eyes be taken from us at a stroke, and the light of our days seem dimmed for ever.

This is the noble way of living. You can merge your griefs in the griefs of all mankind. You can lose the thought of it in rich service of your fellows. You can find your own soul in saving others. It is weak to yield to your sorrows and become a spiritual valetudinarian. It is foolish to seal up every fountain of feeling. It is wicked to drown your sorrow in dissipation. It is suicidal to put emotion away from you, even an emotion of sorrow, and crush the manhood and womanhood out of your souls. Ezekiel's way, when all is said and done, is the chivalrous way, the heroic way, the consecrated way, the way of the Cross and of the Resurrection morning. It is to present your disappointments and sorrows an offering unto God, holy, acceptable, well-pleasing unto him.

So you understand the parable of the death of Ezekiel's wife. You have your work to do in the world. You must so carry yourself that your very disappointments and trials and losses and sorrows shall help you to do it better. You have learned and you have taught others that you have no right to use your wealth, your strength, your gifts, your joys selfishly. You are a steward. You hold all these in trust for the good that you can do. And now I tell you that you must not be selfish with your sorrows. They are to make a better man or woman of you, and many a word which you shall speak, winged with immortality, and many a deed which shall rise like incense to the throne of God, shall prove that you have understood the parable of the death of Ezekiel's wife. I do not promise you that your sorrow shall pass away. I have not so learned Christ. No, but I hear his voice, tender and low, and he speaks to me from beneath the shadow of the Cross, and he says, "Your sorrow shall be turned into joy," not banished for ever but transfigured, transmuted, glorified. Then go your way. Speak unto the people in the morning as thou art commanded, though at even hope dies in your breast, and the light of life burns low; and when the day breaks and the shadows flee away you shall know that the command was good.

AT JAPAN'S MOUNTAIN SHRINE

Japanese Maids in Holiday Dress

Pilgrims Resting at a Tea-House on the Slope of the Holy Mount

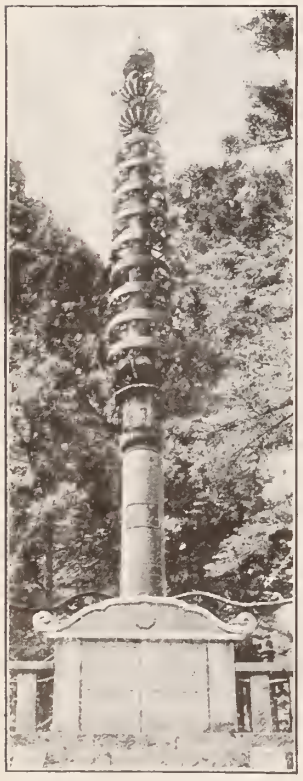
Buddhist Priest of Mount Hiei

By MATTHIAS KLEIN

IT was in the hottest of the summer. Our destination was Mount Hiei, among the ranges beyond Kyoto. We traveled thus far by rail, noting some very interesting things by the way. It commenced to rain, and, to our amusement, we saw a stalwart farmer stalking down the road, carrying a big paper umbrella—to keep his skin dry.

The Illinois cornfields are perhaps no more of a curiosity to some strangers than the almost continuous bamboo groves here are to the foreigner; indeed, a beauty in their way. Conspicuous along the line are the buildings of the famous, or rather infamous, Asahi (Morning Sun) brewery. A glimpse of the top of the pagodas tells the traveler that he is nearing the Mecca of Buddhism.

Among the many temples in this place our eyes spied one of the largest in Japan. The Japanese simplicity is very conspicuous, even in the construction of these mammoth temples. Before ascending the flight of stone steps in front, we had to part with our shoes. Curiously enough, this immense building has only one story, as is the case with most of the temples in Japan. The lofty ceiling was supported by thirty or forty hardwood pillars, probably about three feet in diameter. The floor of the spacious auditorium was covered with soft Japanese matting, upon which, before the centrally located idols, squatted a company of pilgrim travelers from among those who daily stream into this terminal. Only a few were in a praying attitude; all the others sat as though they were spellbound before a theatrical exhibition, blissfully and admiringly gazing upon those idols which stood amid burning candles beyond a finely carved railing.



Steel Shaft to Keep Off Bad Spirits

We traveled in jinrikshas for nearly three hours before reaching the foot of the mountain. Our way led through very interesting villages, whose dwellers wear perhaps the most artistic garb of the Japanese peasants. A sight worth seeing were the many large water-wheels, whose clapping responded to the foaming torrents of the mountain streams. One of the villages, we were told, is particularly favored by the Emperor for this reason: the ancient Emperor, Go Daigo, who lived in the fourteenth century, when escaping from his foes, found refuge among these villagers. Ever since, and especially so during this present reign, many of the Emperor's household servants have been selected from this noted village; also every royal baby has been nursed by one of these kind-hearted women.

We ascended Mount Hiei on foot, but Mrs. Klein and children were taken up in two conveyances. We understood that two of these carriers had once been employed by His Majesty the Emperor for the same service. Short and sturdy women carried our heavy baggage on their heads, with comparative ease, up the steep mountain.

We reached the camp of our associate missionaries, most of whom had been there for some weeks, for which reason the Quarterly Conference convened there. It is a place which for many years has been a great summer resort for missionaries. This mountain is one of the most historic in Japan. Here Buddhism has flourished for many centuries. About 500 years ago the priests numbered many thousands, and had at least 3,000 temples on this elevation alone. They became greatly demoralized and were regular brigands, far too powerful for the Emperor then living in the old capital, Kyoto. He lamented that there were three things he could not control: fire; the river which flows by Kyoto, often overflowing its banks; and the priests of Mount Hiei. Finally, he made a desperate effort to subdue them. His soldiers ascended the mountain, wrecking the temples and killing many of the priests. But still, under the grand century-old cedars, of which there are many of immense size and height—enough to make an American lumberman's mouth water—here and there over the entire mountain top, yet stand a considerable number of ancient as well as more recently built temples. Along the pathways one can see many an old-time priest's tombstone, covered with moss and lichen. The patron god of this hill was Benkei, a veritable Hercules in strength and prowess, whose giant footprints in a monumental rock the priests are still delighted to show. Not far from this spot are twin temples, joined together by a bridge, the cross-beam of which, the Buddhists claim, this giant used as a cross-bar in carrying these temples as stolen property from some other remote place.

Another point of interest is an immense steel shaft or tower, erected while the Emperor resided at Kyoto, in order to protect the imperial palace from wicked spirits. The tower stands due northeast from the palace, the direction from which the spirits are believed to come. Yet the farmers and peasants find their chief attraction of this mountain in a temple devoted exclusively to their interests. In front of the building, beside a laver, is the image of a rat, carved in stone. The farmer well knows that rats are most numerous when crops are most abundant, and, ever wanting bountiful crops, he dares not fail to make his regular pilgrimages to this shrine.

At one of the temple towers, a young priest led us up a steep staircase, where we came into close contact with a lot of ancient idols, claimed to have been brought from India. They were of almost life-size and gaily painted and decorated—all representations of the god of fire. From there we came to a Buddhist school where, during the summer, they usually have a goodly number of devoted students. During this season they had a Buddhist conclave at this centre, where able expounders of their religion from different parts of Japan were among the speakers. At one of their sittings, a prominent priest read and extensively commented on a poem, which well illustrates the vagueness of their teaching. The subject, indeed a homely one, was a farmer losing his cow. He thought she was away off in the wilds, and, with his servants, went in search of her. After spendlng much time without success, they returned home to find the cow in her stall. "So with man," continued the speaker, "who is seeking peace; he resorts to all kinds of exterior objects, but at last, looking within, he finds the long-sought treasure in his own soul."

Before our return, nearly the entire missionary company ascended one of the highest peaks of this range. After climbing a few hours, we reached the grassy summit and tarried to rest a while. Our eyes were indeed bathed in a sea of rapture! We were above mountain-tops, and beheld fertile valleys, also magnificent Lake Biwa, dotted with picturesque islands, whose calm surface shone for more than fifty miles in silvery sheen. Later, when night came on, and these glories disappeared, our eyes beheld yet grander ones. Thousands of lights from hilltop villages and lakeside dwellings, as well as those from the ancient city, Kyoto, then rose like a starry sky from beneath us. Like prophets of old we felt alone, and were impressed with a strong feeling of solemnity and awe while looking upon these thickly-peopled valleys below, to which God had sent us as messengers of light and life.

Carrying the Ladies and Children Up Mount Hiei

THE "TREE-GOD" THAT BUILT A CHURCH

By RICHARD TJADER

FAR out in the Sagalla Hills, a few miles distant from the present station Voi on the Uganda Railroad, where President Roosevelt will probably make his first side trip after big game, stood an old black ebony tree, which for generations had been worshiped as the "tree-god" of the country by the natives of the warlike Wateita tribe. Time and time again the white intruders had tried in vain to subdue and civilize this tribe, which before the terrible rinderpest of a few years ago was one of the wealthiest and largest tribes of that part of Africa.

Some twenty years ago, the Church Missionary Society of England planned to take up mission work among this Wateita people, and an intelligent young man, Alfred E. Wray, volunteered to do the pioneer work. He had a very troublesome journey from the coast. He started out from Mombasa to cross on foot the dreaded Taru Desert, where so many lost their lives for want of water, long before the Uganda Railroad was even surveyed, and arrived one day, at the beginning of the dry season, among the Wateita people, who had some large settlements in the beautiful Sagalla Hills. He was the first white man that had ever tried to live among this tribe.

Mr. Wray only brought a very scant outfit with him, and not knowing one word of the language of the Wateitas, whose speech had never been reduced to writing, he set about at first to inquire from the natives the names of all the common objects he saw around him. Every word that he thus learned he put down in his own way as it sounded to him, and, after a very short time, he was able to make himself understood by the people. To begin with, they received him with a great deal of cordiality and still more curiosity, but, as the months went along, their witch doctors and medicine men began to see that their business of deceiving their ignorant countrymen would suffer through the influence of this foreigner.

These medicine men and witch doctors exercise a great influence over the natives, and are held very much in respect by them.

During the second year of Mr. Wray's life among the Wateitas, the tide seemed to turn against him: the dry season continued a great deal longer than usual, and when the rain finally came it was so scant that the crop for that year failed almost entirely. Now the witch doctors thought that they could "get even" with the foreign intruder, and stirred up the people against him, telling them that they had repeatedly seen him with "white flags," scaring away the rain gods from the country. This offense was entirely unintentional on the part of Mr. Wray, as these "white flags" were only his washing on a line.

One day a young native, whose friendship Mr. Wray seemed to have won, at least to a certain degree, came into his little grass hut, built by himself, and told him that unless he fled that very night, he would be killed, as the witch doctors had succeeded in having the great chief promise that, to pacify the rain-gods and have them send the coveted showers, he would have the foreign white man killed and his belongings burned. Mr. Wray did not quite know what to do to begin with, but not being of the "chicken-hearted" kind, he resolved to trust God and take the consequences.

That evening he went to sleep soundly as usual after his day's work, but shortly before midnight he was awakened by a tremendous noise outside his hut; a war drum was beaten furiously and hundreds of natives with spears and axes had gathered all around to prevent his escape. Big steel spears were thrown through the walls of the hut, and finally one of the men set fire to it. Grabbing his English Bible, the thing he valued most of all his possessions, he rushed out and succeeded in eluding his pursuers in the darkness, without being as much as hurt by the missiles, arrows and spears that were flung at him.

After having hidden himself for a couple of days in the hills, Mr. Wray one day suddenly appeared in the middle of the chief's village as if nothing had happened at all. His courage so impressed the brave natives that they resolved to leave him alone, and for this time at least make no more attempts on his life. But within the next twelve months three more attempts were made to kill him, two of them from ambush, but all three times Mr. Wray most miraculously escaped, going right back again to his old place. His fearless persistence in staying among the tribe in spite of all finally won for him the esteem of the big chief, who promised him that he should have no more trouble after this from the witch doctors and medicine men. Now began a new era in his missionary work. Many times dozens of men would sit down in front of him with their spears stuck down in the ground beside them eagerly listening to his story about the great God of Love.

After more than twelve years of faithful work, Mr. Wray, who had only been home once in the meantime to his native country, England, was called home again, and now told the natives that he was going to marry and bring a white woman with him back to Sagalla. As none of the natives had ever seen a white woman, they told him not to stay away very long, as they were all very curious to see his wife. After a few months' stay in the home land, Mr Wray returned to Mombasa with his young wife, a most intelligent, devout and fearless woman. Mr. Wray, however, did not bring his wife with him to Sagalla right away, but left her at the mission station in Mombasa while he went back to Sagalla to prepare for her coming up there.

As soon as the news was spread in the different villages that their white friend had arrived, hundreds of men and women came up to the main village to see his white "Bibi," and they were all terribly disappointed to find him alone. When asked why he had not brought his wife, he told them that as he loved his wife dearly he did not care to have her life risked before he found out how they now felt about their living among them. They all assured him with one accord, that if he would bring her up, they would never try to do him or her any harm, but that they would treat her just as nicely as they could.

When Mr. Wray expressed his doubt as to the sincerity of their promise, the chief spoke out and said that he could demand anything he wanted from them, and they would give it as evidence of their good intentions. At this moment Mr. Wray could only think of the "tree-god" which had played such an important part in the life of the tribe during generations, and under whose branches so many ghastly and cruel ceremonies had taken place. After a moment's hesitation, he said to the big chief:

"If you give me your tree-god and your holy hill on which it stands, I will believe that you are in earnest, and I will bring my wife up to live and work among your women and children as I have worked among your men."

They all seemed thunderstruck, and with saddened faces they withdrew for a consultation. During these minutes, Mr. Wray's soul went up in prayer to his God for these people among whom he had labored for so many years, seemingly in vain.

Wateita Tribesmen and the "Tree-God"

A few minutes later the crowd returned following their chief, and announced their willingness to turn over to the missionary their tree-god and their holy hill.

Subsequently Mr. Wray went to Mombasa and brought his wife back with him to Sagalla, where he, in the presence of representatives from the whole tribe, cut down their tree-god with the help of some of the natives themselves. As this ebony tree was very valuable, he had it cut up in pieces and sent to a friend in London, who had needleboxes, cardcases, paperweights, etc., made from the beautiful black wood. These pieces were sold among his friends in England and brought him more than three thousand dollars in return, as some friends had given for the good cause as much as a hundred dollars for an article that would be worth perhaps only one.

With this money Mr. Wray purchased a portable church, which was shipped to Mombasa and brought up on the Uganda Railroad, which had then been so far built that construction trains went to within forty miles of the Sagalla Mission Station. From the railroad more than six hundred men, women and children voluntarily brought up the pieces on their own shoulders and helped Mr. Wray to erect the church, which is shown in our last illustration, and which stands exactly over the spot where for generations the old ebony tree had been worshiped as the tree-god of the country. Now hundreds of Christian converts, decently clad, gather in this place to worship the true and living God.

When I was out in Africa, Mr. Wray showed me a letter from the former High Commissioner of British East Africa and Uganda, Sir Harry Johnstone, in which this efficient governor gives Mr. Wray the most eloquent testimony of the services he has rendered in Christianizing, to a great extent, the Wateita tribe.

NOTES OF WOMAN'S PROGRESS

....A BILL on "Qualifications of Voters," and amending the suffrage clause of the Constitution by removing the word "male," has been introduced in the New York State Legislature.

....THE BILL for universal suffrage, entitling all inhabitants of Sweden over twenty-four years of age to vote, passed both chambers of the Swedish Diet on February 13. The vote in the first chamber stood at 120 to 98; in the second, 134 to 94.

....NEW YORK State Woman Suffrage Association has just finished holding a week's series of mass meetings along the Hudson River. They have been most successful and enthusiastic. The chief speaker was Rev. Anna H. Shaw, president of the National Woman Suffrage Association. Others taking part in the meetings were Mrs. Ella Hawley Crossett, president of the State Association; Mrs. Henry Villard, of New York, also an officer in the association; Miss Harriet May Mills, of Syracuse, vice-president, and Miss Helen Drummond, of London, England.

....THERE ARE seventeen suffrage clubs in New York City, federated under the name of the Interurban Woman Suffrage Council. Another new society has recently been formed, of which Mrs. Clarence Mackay is the president. It is called the Equal Franchise League, and includes, besides many well-known women, a number of prominent men, such as the Rev. Dr. Charles Aked, Colonel George Harvey, the Rev. Stephen Wise, William M. Ivins and Charles Sprague Smith. Mrs. Philip Lydig, one of the most beautiful and widely beloved of New York society women, is the treasurer of the new association. She says that she has joined the movement, not so much that she might vote herself, but that she feels for the workingwomen, whose condition would undoubtedly be bettered if they could vote. It is significant that in describing a recent suffrage audience, composed largely of fashionable women, the reporter of a great daily paper said of them: "They need no ballot to win more than equal rights in society"—which is probably largely true. It is the workingwomen who need the ballot.

....AT A RECENT large suffrage meeting in Cooper Institute, Professor Charles Zueblin made an eloquent plea in favor of complete freedom for women. He spoke of the aid which the votes of Colorado women had given to the election of Judge Lindsey; of the part played by St. Louis women in organizing its noble Civic League, and the stand which women are everywhere taking for civic righteousness. At the conclusion of his address it was announced that any questions proposed by the audience would be answered. One man inquired if history furnished any man who had in the same period accomplished so much as Joan of Arc. Professor Charles Sprague Smith replied that Jesus had done so. One asked if the present immorality of men was not largely due to the neglect of mothers, and, if that were so, would not this neglect be increased by adding political responsibilities to those which mothers are already carrying? The point that mothers were very largely to blame for the immorality of their sons was considered a moot point. In any case, it was deemed probable that the sobering and uplifting, sure to come with higher duties, would aid rather than hinder mothers in the performance of their family duties.

Mr. Taft's Opportunity

ON March 4, at noon, William Howard Taft will take the oath of office as President of the United States. For months past there has been a steady concentration of the national hopes upon the incoming Administration. Mr. Taft assumes office at a time which, while generally auspicious, is prolific of great problems affecting the welfare of our people and their future happiness and prosperity. He is practically unpledged, and it is well that he should be so, since it leaves him free to render better service and to be the President of the whole people.

On the threshold of the impending change, the country is naturally asking, "What may we reasonably expect of the new administration?" "What is the one supreme task to which President Taft should first devote his energies?" With a view to testing public opinion on this most important question, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has put the concrete query to a large number of representative Americans. Their replies, which appear in another part of this issue, constitute one of the most remarkable symposiums of public opinion ever printed by any journal. They represent a poll of the most influential element in the nation and may be accepted as an authoritative expression of public sentiment.

Analyzing the 1,456 votes received, we find that there are four dominating problems which the writers urge upon the attention of the new administration. First and supreme is the revision of the tariff. Then follow, in close order upon the leader, the conservation of the nation's natural resources, the regulation of child labor, and the need of a Federal divorce law. Scarcely of secondary urgency, though with a smaller vote, are the demands for a parcels post, for safe and better public health safeguards, for restricted immigration and for anti-tuberculosis legislation. Among obvious tasks, which may take years of effort to consummate, are the reconciliation of capital and labor, the finishing of the Panama Canal, and the obliteration of sectionalism. A larger Navy has a fair-sized following, while only a handful of votes represent the naval-reduction sentiment. International peace has its advocates. About thirty other tasks are suggested, the most notable among them being that the new administration should endeavor to restore business confidence. It is significant that woman suffrage has only three votes.

It may be regarded as reasonably certain that these recommendations, which are inspired by the highest patriotic motives and proceed from a source whose culture and influence cannot be questioned, will receive the consideration they merit. They voice the heart's desire of the American people, who are looking hopefully and expectantly to the new administration.

Mr. Taft has it in his power, by using his influence for the enactment of wise laws to meet the urgent need of the times, to make his administration one that will deserve the united support and approval of the whole people. No President ever had more magnificent opportunities. He enters upon his duties with the heartiest good wishes of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers, who pray that he may be wisely guided and that his official course may be regulated in all things by a sincere desire to serve the best interests of the whole people in the spirit of national righteousness and justice.

Helping the Waldenses

OUR readers will be glad to learn of the gratifying progress of our efforts to aid the Waldenses of Sicily and Calabria, whose churches and people suffered so heavily by the recent earthquake. These people are without doubt the finest type of simple, earnest Christians in Southern Europe at the present day. Mrs. Gilbert Colgate, a wealthy and charitable American lady, first brought the sad plight of the Waldenses to our attention, and urged their relief through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Earthquake Fund. Her visit and warm-hearted advocacy of their cause were supplemented by the personal appeal of Pastor Costabel, delegate from the Waldensian churches to the Evangelical churches of this country. He told of their wrecked meeting-houses, some forty of which are in ruins; of their congregations saddened by many deaths, while thousands were helpless from injuries and exposure. So well attested was the presentation, and so urgent the need, that the sum of $5,000 was immediately forwarded to Italy by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for Waldensian relief.

While this matter was under consideration, Baron Mayor des Planches, the Italian Ambassador, being in New York, visited THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices and expressed himself as delighted to know that the Waldensian appeal was favorably received. He spoke in the highest terms of the sterling Christianity, the simple, earnest lives and the splendid loyalty of these people, whom the Italian government regarded as among its best type of citizens. Hon. Robert Bacon, Secretary of State, on hearing of the remittance to the Waldenses, also expressed himself as deeply gratified that a people so worthy and deserving, and who had to some extent been left unaided till now, should have been helped through the gifts of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Heart's Garden

EVERY careful gardener knows, by the nature of the seeds and bulbs he plants and by the cultivation he bestows upon them, just what results may be expected when the season of blossom and fruitage arrives. He digs out the weeds and clears the ground of all that might injure the growing plants. He sees to it that they have a sufficiency of sunshine or shade, according to their needs. He knows the influence of contiguous growths, some of which sap the young plant's strength and shrivel it, while others draw it up, stalky, weak and worthless. He has learned by experience that exposure, nurture and surroundings are all important to the life and development of the tender plants. If he is seeking for a perfect product, he gives his young charges his constant care, studies their nature closely, and by his skill brings them out to a maturity which delights the beholder.

Every child's heart is a garden. If we would bring the young life to a noble maturity, we must plant there the seeds of character. We must drop in early the lessons of loyalty, truthfulness, honesty, gentleness. We must nourish and encourage their growth by ourselves becoming living examples of those qualities; for a child, like a plant, largely takes the color of its surroundings.

Give to the children your best thoughts—thoughts of honor, purity, patriotism, obedience, love of the beautiful, of nature, of books and pictures—and the juvenile years will be marked by progress in the right direction. Thoughts are things, and every thought, good or bad, expressed so that the child can interpret it, finds lodgment in the little breast and affects the character of the whole after-life.

Is Revivalism Waning?

IT has become the fashion in certain quarters lately to declare that the typical religious revival has had its day, and that those gatherings at which the "old-time religion" proved its power in drawing multitudes to Christ are rapidly becoming things of the past. In view of the notable revivals now progressing in many parts of the world, heathen as well as civilized, it is not easy to perceive the force of such a criticism. At the present time great revivals in Boston, Pittsburg, St. Louis, Montgomery, Ala.; California, Kansas and New Jersey, with thousands of conversions, attest the continuing power of the consecrated evangelist to win souls through the simple yet dramatic presentation of the old Gospel.

Some of the sharpest adverse criticism on revival methods has come from within the Church itself, and this is surely to be regretted. There are, of course, some men who would not hesitate to criticise even the day of Pentecost, because it did not conform to their personal idea of conservative religious procedure. They speak and write learnedly of the "pathology of revivals," the hypnotism of the revivalist, and the power of suggestion over a susceptible audience. They do not believe, as Paul did, in becoming all things to all men, if by any means some might be convicted of sin and brought to repentance. They have a morbid fear of publicity, and of "baring the heart" to the public gaze. This, they urge, is what the man or woman "of fine grain" especially dreads. All of which means that people of this class are intellectually vain and either hyper-sensitive or secretly ashamed of religion. They can never know the pure joy that comes to the heart which confesses Christ before men.

There is nothing in the whole world so sacred as the religion of Jesus Christ. But to set it away on a shelf, out of reach, as too delicate for the touch of unconsecrated hands, is to wholly misapprehend it. It is not a cult too precious for common mortals, but is for daily use, for the saving of souls from sin and helping them to live right. This is the special message which the revivalist carries to the non-churchgoers, and to those in the social depths who are not reached by other means. And if God crowns the revivalist's work with approval and blessing, who shall question the authority of his message or the manner of its delivery?

A Few Errors Corrected

IN the Financial Statement for 1908, covering Income and Expense, in connection with the operation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, and published in our issue of February 17, three items—one for gravel, one for lavatories and one for sand, amounting to $627.21—were accidentally omitted from the Improvement and Maintenance Account. Adding these omitted figures to the Improvement and Maintenance Account makes the latter $12,018.49, instead of $11,391.28, as published.

A typographical error also crept in, by which the total of "Miscellaneous" lost $1. The Grand Total, however, as set forth in the Report, and as attested to by the Public Accountant, as well as all the other items, except those mentioned above, are correct, as published in the Report mentioned. This correction, therefore, in no wise changes the general result as published.

Lincoln Cabin and Marble Shrine

OF the many Lincoln centennial services on February 12, perhaps the most memorable was that held at the Lincoln farm at Hodgenville, Ky., around the log cabin where the great American was born. The exercises consisted in laying the cornerstone of the beautiful marble temple which is to enclose the log cabin, and which will become a fitting shrine for the thousands of pilgrims who, through the generations, will be drawn by reverence and love to visit it. Among the speakers upon the occasion were General James Grant Wilson, of New York; Governor Augustus E. Wilson of Kentucky; General Luke E. Wright, Secretary of War, and former Governor Joseph Folk of Missouri.

President Roosevelt made the chief address. Among other things he said:

He grew to know greatness, but never ease. Success came to him, but never happiness, save that which springs from doing well a painful and a vital task. Power was his, but not pleasure. The furrows deepened on his brow, but his eyes were undimmed by either hate or fear.

That log cabin was the basis of Lincoln's greatness. It contained most of the elements of success that made him good and great. Nancy Hanks, his mother, transmitted to him by heredity those traits of character that were to make him worthy, useful and illustrious. The blood that ran in the veins of Thomas Lincoln, his father, was good; but without the intellect, the heart, the genius and the tuition of Nancy Hanks, he would have remained an ordinary rail-splitter, not known much beyond the boundaries of his farm. His mother, besides having a keen sense of honor and the loveliest disposition, was a woman of courage and indomitable industry. She thought nothing of taking the rifle out of the rack, going into the woods, shooting a deer, dressing it, taking a piece of the venison to the house, and cooking it for the men for dinner. She was fond of reading, and placed in the hands of her young son three books that he fairly devoured and which most affected his intellectual development—the Bible, Æsop's Fables and Pilgrim's Progress. She was the impersonation of truthfulness and honesty, and impressed these principles indelibly upon the heart of her boy. She was a devout Christian, and breathed the religion of Jesus into the young life of her child. Soon after the removal to Indiana, she died. On her deathbed, she placed her hand on the head of her little boy, nine years old, and said: "I am going away from you, Abraham, and I shall not return. I know that you will be a good boy, and that you will be kind to Sarah and to your father. I want you to live as I have taught you, and to love your heavenly Father." Abraham Lincoln said, in after life: "All that I am in this world I owe to my sainted mother."

And yet that such a beautiful character, who had made such an enormous contribution to the better life of the nation and the world, should have been so misunderstood and misrepresented is beyond comprehension. In the fierce campaigns of Civil War time, a vile aspersion on the character of Lincoln's mother was circulated and believed by many in the North as well as South. The records of Hardin County, Kentucky, were searched in vain for the evidence of the marriage of Thomas Lincoln and Nancy Hanks, and many concluded that they had never been married. It seems that they were married in Washington County, Kentucky, June 12, 1806, by Jesse Head, a pioneer Methodist preacher, and the marriage certificate, made out in the handwriting of Rev. Mr. Head, was found in the home of Mrs. Hobart Vawter, whose grandmother was a cousin of Nancy Hanks. Dr. Christopher Columbus Graham, of Louisville, the father-in-law of the late Governor Bramlette and of ex-United States Senator Blackburn, was present at the wedding reception, and at the request of Mr. Henry Watterson wrote an account of this "infair," and testified to it before a notary, in the ninety-eighth year of his age. Dr. Graham told the writer of this article, thirty years ago in Washington, that he was present at that wedding reception, and that the child Abraham Lincoln was born three years after, and that he knew the babe. Mr. Watterson, an ex-Confederate soldier, in a current magazine says: "Pitiable story; one can scarcely read it with dry eyes, but it lifts the veil forever from the cruel mystery which so long clouded the memory of Nancy Hanks. I here dwell upon it and give the details, because it ought to be known to every American who would have the truth of history fulfilled."

The log cabin represented desperately hard work—toil, toil, toil, which in making fibre of body, color of blood, tissue of brain and in the execution of plans spells fully one-half of the success of every man. The cabin was close to nature, the boy that was born in it was close to the ground and the trees and flowers and hills and streams and blue sky and yellow stars, and he had the liberty of God's free air and sunshine. This simple child of nature, by the solitudes of his early life, developed the reflective faculty to a large degree, which was so important to him as a great leader of men. Out of the love of the cabin there grew the large heart that loved the Union and the North, but no better than it did the people of the South.

It is well to build the marble shrine to represent the beauty and majesty of such a man. It is well also to preserve the log cabin and include it in the marble structure, not only to show to what a height from so small a beginning American opportunity may lead, but also to illustrate the inherent relation between the humble cabin and such a colossal mental and moral figure. Neither the marble nor the logs are immortal; but truth, honesty, love, faith and a sanctified Christian motherhood are immortal, and these homespun virtues that began in the primitive period of our civilization are to be continued in the marble structures of the present, if we are to be true to the heritage committed to us and are worthily to perpetuate our institutions. It was the Abraham Lincoln of the log cabin and of the White House that people care for, and the rough log or the hewn stone are only the incidents that remind us of him. The life and labor of Lincoln are immortal.

They may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them. (Rev. 14 : 13.)

The Ceremonies Around the Lincoln Cabin at Hodgenville, Kentucky

The Mammoth Swindler

Harry J. Bauman masqueraded as Dr. Herman Brandt, palming himself off on the credulous as a duke. By his insiduous arts he stole about $500,000 from his victims. His method of fraud was to court some woman of beauty, social standing and wealth; marry her, rob and desert her. If he had confined his fraudulent performances to a dozen or so victims, he might have made his escape from the penalty that overtook him. But fifty women in Europe and America fell into his trap and were victimized by him. He had just worked his confidence game on his fiftieth wife when they caught him, convicted him, and sent him to the Joliet prison. Prominent women in Germany, Italy, Austria and other countries, as well as in the United States, were deceived by him, and he is wanted by the authorities of many cities in Europe and America. There is no form of robbery which is not unholy and censurable, and yet there are few forms of theft so absolutely abominable as the one that Bauman practised. The deceit of the fop in winning the affections of a woman is contemptible enough, but to push that deceit to the mockery of marriage for the purpose of robbery is a crime which ought to shut a man up behind the bars the rest of his life, and in the interest of justice it is to be hoped that indictments will be pushed against Bauman which will keep him in prison until the day of his death.

Ye shall not steal, neither deal falsely, neither lie one to another. (Lev. 19 : 11.)

300 Burned in Mexican Theatre

The Flores Theatre, in the city of Acapulco, Mexico, was burned the other night and over three hundred lives were lost. A hundred others are injured and in the hospitals, many of whom will die. Into the wooden structure a thousand people had been crowded to witness a special performance given for Governor Damian Flores, of the State of Guerrero, who was visiting the city at the time. One of the numbers on the programme consisted of a series of moving pictures. While the operator was exhibiting these, a film caught fire and a blaze was communicated to some of the decorations. The entertainment was a semi-state affair, and wealthy and influential men and women were among the victims. The cause of the catastrophe was the carelessness of the man who worked the moving-picture machine. This fearful disaster is a type of the moral and spiritual destruction produced by the carelessness and ignorance of those entrusted with the responsibility of souls.

They watch for your souls, as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief. (Heb. 13 : 17.)

Pastor Speaks at His Own Funeral

The Rev. Daniel Bassett Leach, an aged clergyman of Bone Gap, near Fairfield, Ill., was told recently that he was going to die. He asked that his graphophone be brought to his bedside. Into the machine he spoke an address and prayers to be used at his grave. When Mr. Leach had finished his task, he had the records repeated, so that there should be no mistake, and thus his relatives, congregation and friends heard him express his faith in divine things and enjoin an earnest Christian life upon the part of his hearers. Every minister and person, by each thought and act, is talking into a graphophone, whose records will be heard on the earth after they have gone from it, and will also be heard when the accounts of the last day shall have been rendered.

For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned. (Matt. 12 : 37.)

President Taft's Opportunity

What the People Expect of His Administration — A Great National Symposium by Senators, Governors, Congressmen, Officials, Bishops, Jurists, Capitalists, College Presidents, Labor Leaders, Authors and Editors on the One Great Task Before the New Administration

Commandant W. G. Ross
U. S. Revenue Cutter Service

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which on previous occasions has opened its columns as a forum for the free discussion of great national questions, decided to invite a presentation of the hopes and expectations of the American people on the threshold of a new Administration. Accordingly, a letter containing the two questions quoted herewith was addressed by this journal to a large number of prominent men and women, all of them representative Americans, many of them leaders in their respective fields in the nation's work, including United States Senators, Congressmen, Governors, admirals, generals, capitalists, jurists, mayors, bishops, presidents of universities, authors, artists and editors. From these nearly two hundred replies were received, in which no less than forty different legislative and administrative tasks were named, each of which was urged by the writers as being the first and most important duty which should devolve upon President Taft and his Administration. Many named several tasks, thus largely increasing the total ballot.

WHAT is the most important task before the new Administration under President Taft? What one great thing should be achieved by the incoming Taft Administration?

The total results of the appeal of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to public opinion as to the most important task before the new Administration, stand as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATORS

International Arbitration

BY U. S. SENATOR E. J. BURKETT, of Nebraska

Establish international arbitration for international controversies. The noblest of Roosevelt's great work was bringing about peace between Japan and Russia, and greater honor still will be to the administration that can bring about peaceful adjustment of controversies between nations.

Hasten the New Tariff

BY U. S. SENATOR MOSES E. CLAPP, of Minnesota

The first real act of the new administration should be promptly to proceed with and conclude the work of revising the tariff, not that any possible schedule will do us any injury, but that the delay and agitation incident to this matter has materially lessened our activities.

Attend to Its Own Business

BY SENATOR A. J. MCLAURIN, of Mississippi

The most important thing for the administration to do is to attend exclusively to executive business, and let Congress attend to legislating and the courts attend to adjudicating.

Equal Opportunity to All

BY U. S. SENATOR PORTER J. MCCUMBER, of North Dakota

There is one problem in particular which transcends all others in its scope and importance—the problem of opening and keeping open the field of business opportunity for each and every American citizen. The work of the present administration in protecting the industrial field against monopoly has been great, the accomplishment great, but the work is not completed. Any cessation of endeavor along this line would lose us all we have gained. This work will not be completed until the rights and duties of great industrial and other combinations have been fixed and determined in such way as to guard every field and avenue of trade and business from the control of monopolies, and maintain equal opportunities for the small and the great.

Abate Evils of Monoploy

By U. S. Senator R. L. Owen, of Oklahoma

Above all in importance is the urgent necessity for abating the obvious evils of monopoly in fixing artificial prices on things used by American consumers and on things created by American producers, and in this way abate the very serious evil of the unequal and unfair distribution of the proceeds of human labor.

Revive Our Shipping Trade

By Hon. William P. Frye, President Pro Tempore, United States Senate

I know of no legislation more important for the consideration of Congress, during the coming administration, than that providing for the revival of the American merchant marine.

A Federal Incorporation Law

By U. S. Senator Jonathan Bourne, of Oregon

The most important tasks include everything that will tend to readjust the controlling forces of society to their legitimate spheres. Our industrialism is driving us upon the rocks of anarchy, upon the shoals of despotism, through unionism on the one hand and plutocracy on the other. An equitable adjustment between these two forces can be obtained through a Federal Incorporation Law.

GOVERNORS OF STATES

Our Forests and Waterways

By Henry B. Quinby, Governor of New Hampshire

It may be our selfish interests, which our mountains and rivers make of considerable importance; it may be that Yankee heritage of cautious thrift, which bids us hold securely that we have before reaching out for more; but to us of New Hampshire no task before the Taft administration seems more important than the conservation of natural resources, including the preservation of the forests and the water powers dependent upon them.

Harmony in Government Work

By B. B. Brooks, Governor of Wyoming

The success of the Taft administration, like the success of any great business enterprise, will depend largely upon the President's ability to bring about a spirit of patriotic harmony in every department and branch of the Federal Government. The Legislative and Judicial Departments, as well as the Executive, should be expected to perform their duties impartially, fearlessly and honestly, in an independent manner.

Preserve High Governmental Ideals

By J. O. Davidson, Governor of Wisconsin

"A government of the people, for the people, and by the people." To bring back the government to the control of the people, wherever they have been deprived of it; to provide facilities by which the people may express their desires in the government, wherever new activities have been assumed; and to preserve for, and hand over to, its successor the unblemished idea of democracy, should be the work of the coming administration.

COLLEGE PRESIDENTS

A Parcels Post

By Dr. James A. Kelso, President of Western Theological Seminary

One of President Taft's greatest tasks is to secure a law giving the people a parcels post. Residence in European countries has brought to the attention of our people some of the privileges which are not enjoyed by the citizens of this great republic, but are taken as a matter of course by our European cousins. One of these is the "parcels post system," which makes possible the economical transmission of small packages, and thereby stimulates trade.

Conserve Natural Resources

By Dr. George S. Davis, President of Normal College of the City of New York

The one thing that is of surpassing vital interest to the people of this nation is the further development of measures for the conservation of our natural resources, including the forests, and for the prevention of their exploitation for private benefit. Out of a general and equitable participation in the material wealth of our country, and out of its economical use, will grow our moral welfare; and the careful regulation of all our natural supplies is not only a matter of immediate self-considering prudence, but a valid duty to future generations as well.

Federal Control in Prohibition Sections

By Dr. John N. Tillman, President University of Arkansas

The most important task is to secure Congressional legislation that will make it impossible for the United States Government to grant a retail liquor dealer's license in a locality where State prohibition prevails, and to secure the enactment of laws that will prohibit the shipment of liquors into dry territory. A number of courageous commonwealths have State-wide prohibition, and many communities have local laws forbidding the sale of liquors, and yet this great republic flagrantly illuses the majority by permitting the above-mentioned abuses. President Taft can accomplish this great reform and earn the praise of many good people, especially in the South.

Abolish the Liquor Traffic

By Dr. Fletcher Homan, President Willamette University

The greatest question at the present time is that of abolishing the liquor traffic from the United States. It would gratify millions of the best citizens of the United States to have Mr. Taft take hold of this question, and give the result of his investigations to the people of the nation.

Higher Public Morality

By Dr. Guy P. Benton, President of Miami University

The most important task before the new national administration will be the maintenance of the high standards of public morality established by President Roosevelt, in such a way as will best contribute to the peace of mind of the entire American people.

Protect Prohibition Territory

By Dr. M. Vayhinger, President Taylor University

The most important task of the new administration, under President Taft, is to protect prohibition territory from the shipment of liquor under the Interstate Commerce Law. It is the regulation of child labor by turning the forces of Federal authority in the way of removing the cause thereof, namely, the saloon. It is to assist, with all the forces of the government, to remove the conflict between capital and labor, and in every way to bring about the purification of politics.

U. S. Senator R. L. Owen

Cut Out the Spoils System

By Dr. David Starr Jordan, President of Leland Stanford, Junior, University

The most important thing that the next administration can give is to set the example of clean and just executive work, cutting out the spoils system and other forms of graft, just as far as may be, in everything with which the government has to deal. Mere financial matters are of very much less consequence than those which deal with the preservation of our resources for the future and with matters pertaining to the public health. In a general way,

Child Labor, Immigration, Postal Savings Banks

the most important matters under the government are those which relate to the applications of science on a scale too large to be under the control of individuals. To do this, repeal such statutes and abrogate such customs as may be burdens. Direct help to anybody, or to any group of men, means a corresponding direct hindrance to somebody else.

Reduce Army and Navy Expenses

By Dr. S. C. Mitchell, President University of College

The best possible achievement of the next administration would be the reduction of the expenditures of our government, for the Army and Navy, to a sane and sensible basis; the removal from the popular mind of all apprehension as to the policy of the government, and the reassertion by this great and God-fearing people of its faith in interational peace by peaceful methods.

Urge Interstate Co-operation

By Dr. W. O. Thompson, President, Ohio State University

In the next few years the federal government will do wisely if it develops a clear understanding and a wise co-operation with the several States in the matter of controlling interstate commerce, and in developing a commercial unity which shall be effective in breaking down local prejudices.

Uphold the Roosevelt Standard

By Representative Charles E. Townsend, of Michigan

The crowning glory of the Roosevelt administration has been and is the impetus given to a higher, cleaner and more patriotic public service. The new administration can do no greater thing than to maintain the higher level of civic and official righteousness. With this established, the great problems of the nation will be correctly solved.

Hon. Geo. A. Pearre
Congressman from Maryland

Bishop John N. McCormick

Protect Homes and Children

By Dr. John Cavanaugh, President Notre Dame University

Two very important matters are a strict Federal divorce law and the effective prohibition of child labor. The making of men and the saving of homes need encouragement. The condition induced by child labor, in certain sections of our country, would bring a blush to the cheek of a Hottentot, if a Hottentot ever changed color. The fact that one-twelfth of the marriages in the United States end in divorce proves that our American people are fast losing all idea of the sanctity and inviolability of the marriage bond.

Efface Sectional Lines

By Dr. S. C. Mitchell, President University of South Carolina

The one great thing which should be achieved by the incoming administration is the fulfilment of Mr. Taft's purpose as stated in Augusta, Georgia: "I pray that it may be given to me to obliterate all sectional lines, and leave nothing of difference between the North and the South, save friendly emulation for the benefit of our common country." For this task the hour has struck. The enrichment of rural life through the Department of Agriculture will receive encouragement at the hands of so practical a builder as Mr. Taft. The revision of the tariff should be followed by a progessive income and inheritance tax.

Carry Out His Own Ideals

By Dr. Henry Churchill King, President of Oberlin College

I could not ask more of President Taft's administration than that he should be able to carry out, so far as possible, the ideals which he has himself shown so plainly that he has.

Follow Roosevelt's Lead

By Arthur J. Roberts, President of Colby College, Waterville, Me.

The most important task of the new administration is to prevent the reaction which is very likely to follow the revival of civic and business righteousness the country has experienced under President Roosevelt.

Higher and Broader Statesmanship

By Dr. Charles W. Needham, President of George Washington University

I look to the Taft administration with great expectation and hope, not for any one thing, but for a wise and prudent settlement and adjustment of the important policies which President Roosevelt has inaugurated and which are now before the people for discussion. Upon all these questions the public conscience has been thoroughly aroused, and it will be for Mr. Taft to work out conclusions and the settlement of these issues upon a higher and broader plane.

Re-Establish the Old Ideals

By Dr. Horace Ellis, President of Vincennes University

Establish anew in the American heart the ideals of the fathers, which would mean that "world power," "gentlemen of leisure," "great navy" shall be terms utterly distasteful to our people; that the arts of peace, rather than the "glories" of war, shall be sought; that the great army of toilers—in factory, shop, forest, on the farm, or on the great lines of transportation—are our closest of kin, our real brethren, and entitled to the nation's fondest attention. In harmony with the wishes of thousands of others, I sincerely wish Mr. Taft's administration may procure a return to true democratic practices.

Teach the People Independence

By Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, President of Brown University

The great need of the country is that the people should learn to support the government, instead of looking to the government to support and direct and nourish them. We must cease to look on the President as a fairy godmother, or a refuge in every time of local trouble. Each community must shovel its own sidewalks, each State reform its own abuses, and not look to Washington to remedy local inertia and cowardice.

EMINENT CHURCHMEN

Keep Out Ignorant Aliens

By Bishop John H. Vincent, of Indianapolis, Ind.

The greatest need in America to-day is the education of every man, woman and child; and the defeat of the scheme for filling our land with ignorant European masses, who can easily be controlled at the polls by leaders who are opposed to personal freedom and universal education.

No Union of Church and State

By Bishop James Henry Darlington, Harrisburg, Pa.

The greatest need is to stop absolutely all money appropriations by either the Federal or State governments to sectarian hospitals, schools, orphanages, and institutional homes, of the Roman or any other religious body, in the United States, in Porto Rico and the Philippines, to the Indians of the West, or on the Isthmus of Panama. There must be no union, even in the slightest degree, of Church and State in this country.

Postal Savings Bank Urged

By Benjamin Tucker Tanner, A. M. E. Bishop, Washington, D. C.

The first task is a parcels post. We have an immense country, and it is rapidly filling up. Why should not its people have the opportunity of sending to each other their small tokens of love or gratitude by post? Let Congress give us postal savings banks, and let us have a happy return to fractional currency. How often a 25-cent piece would be sent as savings when it is not convenient to send a $1 piece!

Uphold Sanctity of the Courts

By Bishop D. A. Goodsell, of New York

No legislation can give greater sanctity to the courts—reverence for courts can only be compelled by righteous decisions and by the cessation, on the part of eminent lawyers, of the use of their great ability in teaching corporations how to evade the law. The slowness and cost of legal proceedings creates among the masses the conviction that our courts are the fountains of injustice. Any one in touch with the masses knows their feeling on this point. They hold that justice should never cost more than the amount in question, and that estates, even small ones, should not be regarded "as belonging to the profession."

The food laws should be made more stringent, and the penalty be the same as for obtaining money on false pretenses, which is the fact when goods are wrongly named and are adulterated. The difficulty of obtaining legislation as to pure food, and the difficulties thrown in the way of the execution of the law, show how vast are the interests involved and how great has been the wrong as to adulteration. These seem to me to be necessary for the peace, the health and the righteousness of the nation.

Extension of Civil Service

BY BISHOP JOHN N. MCCORMICK, of Michigan

The greatest thing which could be achieved by the incoming Taft administration would be the bona fide support and extension of Civil Service laws, with competitive examinations and all proper safeguards, and thus the curtailment, and, so far as possible, the abolition, of patronage.

Raise the Nation's Moral Spirit

BY BISHOP EDWARD FAWCETT, Quincy, Ill.

The greatest good to the largest number may be looked for in the persistent continuation and accentuation of the moral spirit in the affairs of the government, which has been recognized by the multitudes as motive during the administration of President Roosevelt.

Carry Out Roosevelt Policies

BY BISHOP H. S. HOFFMAN, Philadelphia

The paramount achievement of Mr. Taft's administration depends upon adhesion to the way that has been blazed by President Roosevelt, his predecessor. The outgoing President has awakened and made sensitive the conscience of the people. There can be no doubt but that the success and prosperity of our nation rests on shifting sand if the moral tone is lowered. The new administration will surely achieve its best results by fostering and strengthening, throughout the land, a vigorous sentiment favorable to justice and rectitude. Graft must be made increasingly unpopular, public office must be isolated from unholy alliance with the great and aggressive corporations.

Follow McKinley and Roosevelt

BY BISHOP SAMUEL C. EDSALL, of Minneapolis

The most important task before the new administration is a sane, wise and yet persistent continuance of the tasks which have been begun under the McKinley and Roosevelt administrations. Control of great corporations, and especially such supervision as will safeguard the issuance of stocks and bonds, is the most important of all present governmental duties. The conservation of natural resources is a matter of tremendous importance, in which the nation and the States should co-operate. The continuance of the work now going on in the Philippines and at Panama are the main duties before the Taft administration. Free trade with the Philippines is the first great thing that I hope the President-elect may induce Congress to grant.

Elevate the Civil Service

BY BISHOP C. C. GRAFTON, of Wisconsin

Politics can never be purified and corruption diminished without the prizes of politics being destroyed. This can only be done by extension of the Civil Service. All the servants of the government in the Postoffice Department, the Consulate, the Custom House, should be under the Civil Service régime. Same with the Cabinet officers, Ambassadors, and a few others; there should be no change with the incoming of a new administration.

Knit North and South

BY BISHOP DAVID H. MOORE, Cincinnati

If Mr. Taft succeeds in introducing throughout the Southern States a worthy competitor of the Democratic Party, thus securing identity of interests North and South, he will have made his administration immortal.

Guard Home Sanctity

BY BISHOP WILLIAM T. SABINE, New York City

President Taft's most important task is a Federal divorce law. We need to guard in every way the sanctity of the family life and its integrity.

REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS

Restore the Merchant Marine

BY REPRESENTATIVE GEORGE E. WALDO, New York

The most important task now before Mr. Taft's new administration, and before the country, is the restoration of the American merchant marine. Our deep-sea going vessels have practically disappeared from the sea. We have no sailors to man the ships of our Navy; we have no American ships to carry coal and supplies when our fleet has to leave our coasts. When our fleet was sent to the East, we were obliged to hire foreign vessels as colliers. In case of war, our Navy would be stranded, for in such case we could not use foreign vessels as colliers. We are every year now paying nearly $250,000,000 in freight and passenger fares to foreign ships, which, if paid to American ships and sailors and expended in American shipyards in the construction of American vessels, would add enormously to the welfare and prosperity of our country.

Under the Gallinger bill, introduced by Senator Gallinger in the Fifty-ninth Congress, an average expenditure of $5,000,000 was called for, and it was the testimony of all of the best shipping men of our country that this small expenditure would have given us again an American merchant marine. I can only believe that it is owing to the fact that the public has had so little information on this subject that it does not seem possible to obtain this most necessary legislation.

Uphold the Roosevelt Standard

BY CONGRESSMAN CHARLES E. TOWNSEND, Michigan

The crowning glory of the Roosevelt administration has been and is the impetus given to a higher, cleaner and more patriotic public service. The new administration can do no greater thing than to maintain the higher level of civic and official righteousness.

The First Important Duty

BY REPRESENTATIVE MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL, of New York

The first important task is the revision of the tariff and the rewriting of the schedules for the relief of the people who are now complaining of the excessive burdens imposed by the duties, and also in such manner as to produce sufficient revenue to pay the expenses of the government. That will not be an easy matter, for the expenses are constantly growing. Ours is, in my judgment, an extravagant government, especially for the maintenance of its military establishment. Yet the people do not seem to object to the great army and navy appropriations. Perhaps when they pay duties, or pay taxes in such a way that they will feel them, they will not look with so much complacency on those tremendous and growing budgets for our army and navy.

Reduce the Tariff

BY REPRESENTATIVE G. M. HITCHCOCK, Nebraska

The most important task before the new administration under President Taft is such a radical reduction of the tariff as will serve greatly to reduce the cost of living to the people of the United States and relieve them of the present exorbitant necessary

Bishop W. F. Mallalieu
M. E. Church

Governor A. J. Pothier expenses resulting from the tariff and the trusts which have grown up under it.

Government by the People

BY REPRESENTATIVE GEO. A. PEARRE, of Maryland

The one great thing that should be achieved by the incoming administration is the restoration of the government of this country to the people of the United States, through their representatives in Congress, of which they have been deprived by what is called the "House Organization." This may or may not include an equally important "desideratum" of the elimination of the use of inordinate sums of money in all national elections.

International Peace the Goal

BY REPRESENTATIVE RICHARD BARTHOLDT, Missouri

President Taft can make himself immortal if he would perfect the legal machinery by which differences between nations will be settled by judicial decision instead of by war. A good start has been made, and if present arbitration treaties are still further extended the era of bloody war will soon be past. As he is of a judicial mind, this idea will strongly appeal to the new President.

Maintain Public Morality

BY REPRESENTATIVE E. A. HAYES, of California

I believe the most important duty the administration has to perform is to see to it that the gains in public morality, which we as a nation have made during the present administration, are not lost. There has been a great moral uplift and a raising of ideals in the public service, which need to be and will be strengthened by the incoming administration. The wholesome effort to make all, rich and poor, great and small, alike amenable to the laws in this country, will, I hope, be supplemented with an effort so to continue the campaign in this direction as not seriously to injure or alarm the business interests of the country.

Develop the Navy

BY REPRESENTATIVE RICHMOND PEARSON HOBSON, of Alabama

The development of the American Navy to meet the requirements of the law of self-preservation and the demands for peace, and, therefore, the opportunity to Christianize the peoples of the earth, particularly those of Asia and more especially the inhabitants of the empire of China, and thereby to avert the conflict toward which the withdrawal of our fleet from the Pacific is setting us—that is, the conflict between the yellow race and the white race—is a task exceeding in importance any other that the incoming administration will have to meet.

Dig a Sea Level Canal

BY JOHN LOWE, Rear-Admiral, U. S. Navy, Retired

The one great thing that should be done by the incoming administration, the one thing that would most redound to the honor and glory of God, and to the credit and prestige of the American nation, is the speedy building of an ocean-to-ocean canal, upon a sea level throughout. This canal, backed up by a Navy big enough to be peace-preserving, would make America the foremost power of the world, and we all know that she always would be well worthy of her high calling.

Save Our Dying Forests

BY REAR-ADMIRAL HARRIE WEBSTER, U. S. Navy

The most valuable problem confronting the incoming administration is forest preservation. Unless a radical improvement is made in our treatment of the forest problem the future will see broad areas of the best cultivable land given over to barrenness and solitude. Immediate measures are imperative, for the process of deforestation is making rapid progress in America, and already there are areas where crops have become precarious where fomerly nature was a lavish giver. The longer the control of our forests by the general government is delayed the more difficult will be the process of recovery; in some cases that process will be impossible, for denudation of mountains of forest precedes but a few years the denudation of soil as well; then the process of reforestation becomes impossible.

The Two Greatest Tasks

BY WORTH G. ROSS, Captain Commandant, U. S. Revenue Cutter Service

The tasks which are of great national importance, and should receive weighty consideration, are: First, the conservation of our natural resources, and second, the upbuilding of the United States merchant marine.

Regulate Ownership of Land

BY REAR-ADMIRAL E. O. MATTHEWS, U. S. Navy

One of President Taft's tasks is to appoint a committee of common-sense men to draw up plans, regardless of precedents, for regulating land ownership. For instance, I understand that men of large wealth have bought a large tract of land, I think in West Virginia, giving them the exclusive right to coal, timber, etc., with all water rights, regardless of the rights of others. They cannot farm all this, and by present laws they may hold it forever.

In New Zealand they drew up some common-sense rules, and large estates were divided among actual residents, and the original owners were offered a fair price, which they could accept from the government, or it would be taken. They were obliged to sell at such a price, for lots of a given size, to any party who lived on it and worked it. The government owned everything below the surface. It could rent the minerals, etc., as it deemed best.

Teach Personal Responsibility to Law

BY REAR-ADMIRAL ASA WALKER, U. S. Navy

What the country needs more than anything else is a movement, educational, social or political, to bring home to each individual the consciousness of a personal responsibility to law and order and a proper respect for the rights of his neighbor. If it be possible for the administration so to remedy the workings of our courts that justice may be speedy, that criminals may not escape by technicalities and that juries may not be selected from the most ignorant and least intelligent, it will make a record. Does this come under the head of "greater sanctity of our courts"?

Accelerate Processes of Justice

BY GENERAL WILLIAM CROZIER, Chief of Ordinance, United States

The most important subject of reform which will be before the next administration will be that of the acceleration of the processes, and the diminution of the cumbersomeness with which justice is administered in this country.

Harmonize the Race Question

BY GEO. C. REMEY, Rear Admiral, U. S. Navy

It would be a great deed and most important to settle the race question, to establish harmony and peace between the races. Some thinkers believe that the negro and the white cannot live peacefully in large numbers in the same country politically and socially equal; that one race must and will dominate the other politically and socially. Social equality and holding the higher offices of the government will not with us be extended to another race than white. The races should work out their own evolution, and legislation should assist.

The race question is most important, and should be faced and settled, and facts should not be set aside by theories. The Philippine Islands is a momentous question—What to do with them? I say treat them with justice—as we do Hawaii, as if they belonged to us, as in fact they do, and then proclaim to the world that our flag is there to stay.

Purify Politics

BY REAR-ADMIRAL D. B. HARMONY, U. S. Navy, Retired

The most important task before the next administration is the purification of politics; recovery of stolen lands, and punishment of the thieves; and, in the interest of and to secure peace, an increase of the Navy until it is equal to that of any other power except Great Britain.

Three Reforms Desirable

BY REAR-ADMIRAL CASPAR F. GOODRICH, U. S. Navy, Retired

The most important tasks before the new administration, under President Taft, are: A parcels post, preservation of forests, and a more efficient consular service. The Federal Government should do nothing which the individual can do.

Abolish the Protective Tariff

BY REAR-ADMIRAL F. E. CHADWICK, U. S. Navy, Retired

The one great thing which should be achieved is the abolition of the old man of the sea who has so long hampered us, Protection. The question of lowering duties is an entirely secondary one. We want to be rid of a debasing principle. No evil has ever happened to this country so gigantic in its effects as protection, except slavery. The one great achievement will be the destruction of this monstrous evil. It is our slavery of to-day.

OFFICIALS, LAWYERS, BUSINESS MEN

Modify the Immigration Laws

By Jesse R. Grant, of New York, Son of President Grant

The modification of our immigration laws, so as to exclude the yellow races and admit only those white peoples who shall not lower the average of American citizenship. The aristocracy of wealth is a paramount problem, the solution of which will not be confined to one administration. This problem will occupy the middle of the stage for many years.

An Open Door in the Orient

By Francis B. Loomis, U. S. Commissioner to the Tokyo Exposition, Former Minister to Venezuela

In foreign affairs, perhaps the greatest problem which will present itself for solution to the administration of Mr. Taft, and one which he is himself uniquely and pre-eminently qualified to consider, is the rearrangement of relations with the Orient. We will have, probably within the term of the next President, to meet and solve some very delicate problems in connection with our relations with both China and Japan; and, above all, we shall probably have to define, once for all, our attitude, from a racial point of view, in respect to the Orientals.

Uniformity in Divorce Laws

By Walter Phelps Dodge, Author and Jurist, Weatogue, Conn.

A Federal divorce law is the most necessary thing. The present chaotic condition of the divorce laws of the different States is a crying scandal; while foreign courts of law are much embarrassed at the possibility of recognizing a divorce good in half the States and invalid in the other half. I do not refer to the genuine decree obtained by an alien in South Dakota, after due residence, personal service abroad and appearance by respondent, but to fraudulent decrees, good only in one State.

A Free Press

By John Mitchell, Vice-President American Federation of Labor

The most important work of the new administration will be to preserve inviolate the constitutional, traditional and inherent liberty of the people to write, speak and print their opinions, being responsible, under the law and to a jury, for what they write, say or print. Any system which permits, under whatever pretext, a censorship of speech or press, except in times of war, will prove destructive of liberty and will lead to greater evils than the alleged wrongs which the denial of these rights seeks to correct.

National Progress the Goal

By Hon. B. B. N. Macfarland, Commissioner of the District of Columbia

President Taft has already admirably indicated that his great tasks will be the general advancement of the national progress by constructive statesmanship, and by safeguarding and improving our social and political institutions. Incidentally, I believe the Taft administration will produce the gradual breaking up of the "solid South" in politics.

Complete the Panama Canal

By Edward Lauterbach, Lawyer, New York

The early completion of the Panama Canal is probably the one paramount matter to be achieved. Whether it can be fully accomplished before the termination of the administration of President Taft, unless he proves to be his own successor (a consummation devoutly to be wished) no one can predict; but certainly a substantial progress, in which not only this nation, but the whole world, will be interested is certain to be made. The congestion in the larger cities, resulting from immigration, should be remedied, through distribution of these people and by treaties with foreign nations.

Protect Natural Resources

By George W. Woodruff, Assistant Attorney-General, Department of the Interior

The most important task before the incoming administration is the establishment of a reasonable and practicable policy for the conservation of national resources, in which I include not only such physical resources as forests, waterways, waterpowers, soil productivity, farm and game animals, and health, but also the moral, intellectual and social integrity of our people. This is more a problem for Congress, rather than for the Executive.

Build Good Country Roads

By Amzi L. Barber, Capitalist

One great thing to be achieved by the incoming Taft administration should be the commencement and carrying out of a new policy, upon the part of the national government, by making an appropriation of say $20,000,000 for the building of good country roads in the United States. This appropriation should be made annually, and distributed among the several States in proportion to population, on condition that the several States accepting their share should provide $3 in addition to every $1 received from the national government. Of this $3 the State itself should furnish $1. The counties and the towns accepting and enjoying the benefit of the $2 thus provided should in turn furnish, each of them, an additional $1. Such a plan as this would insure the spending of $80,000,000 annually on the construction of good roads.

Efficient Insurance Against War

By Hudson Maxim, Inventor, Brooklyn

I have selected that which is of the most vital concern to the broad interests of the American people, and it is efficient insurance against war—such an insurance as shall be a warranty of enduring peace.

There is only one thing that can give us this happy security, and it is an efficient Navy—one big enough and powerful enough to circle our shores with a wall of steel, through which no enemy can penetrate to work us harm. There is no greater mistake than to cosider preparedness for war an enticement to war. But our defenselessness at the present time is an enticement to attack from the great war powers who are better prepared.

Readjust National Finances

By Hon. Charles H. Treat, Assistant United States Treasurer

The all-important thing of to-day is to reinforce the money requirements of the Treasury; the next is the readjustment of the tariff, and the third monetary reform. Prosperity must come through reassured abundance of revenue and an adequate monetary system that will not only insure confidence as to its stability, but be expansive and safeguarded to meet the growing needs of business.

Public Health Laws Needed

By Horace Fletcher, Author and Dietitian

Public health, founded on study of preventive measures, is the most important concern. I have ideas as to the attainment of health for the nation, and am pushing them through by all means possible. Support of Irving Fisher's Committee of One Hundred on Public Health will do more than all else to attain this end.

Promote Education

By Hon. Elmer Ellsworth Brown, United States Commissioner of Education

The fact that the past few years have been a time of powerful emphasis upon military force as an element in our national safety is an imperative reason why the next few years should be a time of emphasis upon education as a still more important element in our national safety.

Stricter Postal Regulations

By Anthony Comstock, President of the Society for the Prevention of Vice

Amend existing statutes, making them more drastic, comprehensive and specific, both as affecting matters imported and disseminated by mail or distributed through common carriers.

Deforestation a Danger

By Elliott Flower, Author, Madison, Wis.

The conservation of our natural resources is the most important task before the Taft administration. The future of the country depends upon it. Food, warmth, housing and industry all depend upon it. Any complete and permanent system of inland waterways must depend upon it.

Get the Land Back to the People

By Bolton Hall, Author, New York

In the beginning it was said that "the earth should bring forth abundantly to satisfy the desire of every living thing." In order that it may bring forth at all, it is necessary that labor should get at the earth. The government has spent huge funds upon reclamation and irrigation; and in many cases, as in Wyoming and Montana, the lands have cost too much for ordinary farmers with ordinary methods. The most crying and practical need now is to teach farmers intensive agriculture, so that these little lands may really give "three acres and liberty," as well as the normal living that the farmer gets. We must first get the land back to the people. Then we shall get the people back to the land.

Purity in Business and Municipal Affairs

By Horatio C. King, Lawyer, Author and Lecturer

The one great thing which the incoming Taft administration should try to achieve is the further purification of business and municipal affairs, which Mr. Roosevelt has so ably instituted. Bad legislation will speedily correct itself; but that which this country has the most to dread is the operation of the rich criminals, who are able to defeat the ends of justice by the power of money; the combination of the capitalists and the trades unions in restraint of trade, and the well-nigh universal graft which is sapping the foundations of the republic.

Give the South Recognition

By Clark Howell, Editor, Atlanta Constitution

The greatest work ahead of the incoming federal administration is the materialization of the pledge of Mr. Taft, as made repeatedly in his recent Southern addresses, that in the matter of federal appointments all sections of the country will be treated with due and reasonable consideration by the national administration, and that in appointments for office selections will be made with a proper regard to the

A Young Sixteenth Century Martyr

Painting by Willem Geets, published in the London Sphere

Jeannette de Santhove on Her Way to Execution

RECENTLY exhibited in the Guildhall, London, was a picture full of religious significance, a reproduction of which appears on this page. It was painted by Willem Geets, and is the property of the Corporation of Birmingham. The incident it depicts is recorded in the registry of the cathedral at Ghent, a city of Belgium. In the year 1526, when the throne was occupied by Charles V., the monarch before whom Luther appeared in the Diet of Worms, a notable trial took place. A girl, known as Jeannette de Santhove, was arraigned for holding doctrines similar to those proclaimed by Luther. There was no question as to her guilt, for she openly avowed her faith before the priests and high ecclesiastical functionaries who were her judges. There appears to have been some delay before condemnation was pronounced, probably to allow an opportunity for the priests to argue with her. It may have been, too, due to the reluctance of the judges to condemn so young a heretic to death. In the end, however, it was found that delay was futile, and the girl was condemned to be buried alive.

The artist chose for the subject of his painting the time when the girl was brought out of the cathedral to be conducted to execution. He has portrayed with exquisite feeling, and no little skill, the varied expressions on the faces of principals and witnesses. The girl, clad in the penitent's white robes, with a cord around her neck, has a face in which there is no fear or hesitation. It is solemn, for she is face to face with death in a horrible form, but she turns away from the priest who is pleading with her, and is evidently deaf to his words. Before her, as if forcing the repulsive details of her execution on her attention, marches a hunchback, bearing the pick and a cord to bind her limbs, and on his left is the man with a spade to dig her grave. Behind her are monks chanting their litany, and on either side are spectators, kept back by the civic guards. Among these spectators is a man who evidently agrees with her judges, for he has clenched his fists as if taunting and denouncing her. There are women looking on, some with severe, inflexible countenances, but others in which pity and sympathy for the young victim are working, while others are unconcerned and merely interested in the spectacle.

It seems inconceivable to us now that the leaders of a church calling itself by the name of Christ could have condemned a girl so young and frail to a death so horrible. She looks so innocent that one wonders that they did not let her live, be her faith what it might. Yet the persecuting spirit takes no notice of age or sex. Nor has one period a monopoly of it. It is but a short time ago that a Presbyterian minister said openly on the platform of a meeting in Philadelphia: "If I had my way about it, I would have an executioner called in to deal with all heretics and blasphemers. Burning at the stake would be too good for those who revile religion and take the Lord's name in vain. The growth of heresy is such to-day that nothing but measures such as this can stop it." We can imagine that such words, so like those of the sixteenth century, and those even of the apostles in Christ's lifetime, must have drawn from the gentle spirit of the Master the reproof, "Ye know not what spirit ye are of."

AN INFORMAL CHAT WITH OUR READERS

EVERY day still brings us many dozens of letters from enthusiastic friends, speaking in glowing and most gratifying terms of this, that or the other of our Premiums for 1908-09. And not the least gratifying part of it is the fact that the Premium which we send FREE with every new or renewed subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD —our beautiful Art Gallery De Luxe—has called forth many particularly flattering adjectives.

OUR ART GALLERY MOUNTED

MANY hundreds of our subscribers have taken advantage of our Special Offer, previously announced, and by sending us 50 cents secured a set of our famous Art Gallery De Luxe pictures, handsomely mounted on rich Art Paper, Cream Tint, size 15x20 inches, ready for framing, and delivered by express, in addition to the set of unmounted pictures which they already possessed. Since then almost every letter received from these subscribers says, in effect, one and the same thing: that the exquisite mounts enhance the value of the Art Gallery tenfold. A prominent man in the business and social world said in our offices the other day, that he had in his home a set of these mounted pictures and would not take $10 for the collection.

FROM DIFFERENT POINTS OF VIEW

TO quote at random from our letters commenting on the Art Gallery, one writer says: "The pictures are such excellent copies that when placed on the wall it is indeed difficult to determine whether or not they are done in oil." Another tells us that "This collection of beautiful pictures surpasses, in my estimation, anything heretofore sent out as a CHRISTIAN HERALD premium;" while one subscriber assures us that her "delight was unbounded over the beautiful pictures," and still another friend says, "All of the reproductions are so beautiful that it is hard to say which is the finest of them all." "Far in advance of my liveliest anticipations," writes a warm admirer; and in the language of another, "The exquisitely beautiful pictures were received, and words are wholly inadequate to express my appreciation of their beauty." With this writer our own views concur, for, as we have so often said on other occasions, we can find no words that will do justice to the wonderful richness and superb beauty of our master premium, our far-famed Art Gallery De Luxe—infinitely more beautiful when the individual pictures are mounted, as described above.

WHERE MANY MINDS THINK ALIKE

SO much for our Art Gallery De Luxe; now a word as to our great Premium Books, all of which have been running in their second editions for many weeks. We have sung their praises so loudly in former issues that we will not add more to our own words at this time, but we cannot resist reprinting a few of the countless "nice things" said of these books by other delighted readers. Of the Inside History of the White House a friend writes us: "It is not only interesting and a valuable addition to our library, but is more satisfactory than a visit to the real White House, because it contains so much more than a visitor could have the privilege of seeing." A letter received from a reader a while ago confesses that "the splendid premium, Inside History of the White House, is not only worth alone the $2 paid for it with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a year, but I would not take that sum for the book if I could not get another;" and, as if to show us that more than one person feels that way about it, we have another letter stating, "My husband says he would not take $5 in exchange for the White House book; the more one reads it, the more one wants to read it, for there is always something new."

KEEN AND CRITICAL APPRECIATION

IN commenting on After Death, What? a reader declares, "I do not feel that I can praise this book too highly"; while another writes us, "This work is the work of a master mind, and is worth many times what it has cost me." In the opinion of one subscriber, "The chapter, 'A Symposium on Immortality,' is easily worth alone the price of the whole volume. This chapter I find contains some of the richest thoughts of all literature." From another of our friends we hear: "I am happy in the possession of this wonderful and delightful book, which is worth many times the price you ask for it." And so our mail runs. Each day brings us fresh contributions to the cherished file of letters from appreciative friends. Stories and Legends still continues to hold its own among our premium books, and one reader assures us that the little classic is "uplifting and appeals to the best in human nature." As these various opinions largely reflect our own judgment of these volumes, we cannot but feel that our readers show a very keen appreciation of what is worth while in the world of books.

AN AUCTION OF MEN

ONE of the most remarkable auctions that has occurred for many years in America took place recently in the Parkside Presbyterian Church, in Brooklyn, N. Y. It was arranged by the pastor to bring home to his congregation the fact that there are a large number of men, able and willing to work, in the community, but who have been unable to secure employment and are now practically destitute. So startling was the announcement of the auction and so dramatically was it carried out that it was a topic of discussion for days, both by people and newspapers.

Fully fifteen hundred people came to the church on Sunday night, many of them being non-members, but impelled by curiosity to attend the strange meeting. Thirty-five men, who were unable to get employment, had agreed to appear and be auctioned off to whoever would guarantee them food and shelter.

The audience gasped in astonishment when the men filed in. They all wore black masks, from which a long, black front piece hung down to the chest. They were fairly well dressed, all had clean collars, and most of them were young. The men were arranged in a group before the organ, and the director of the evening, Mr. O'Loughlin, delivered an address to them, telling them that they should not be ashamed and that many in the house would be in the same predicament in a few weeks if they lost their positions, and would come and ask to be auctioned off. Many of the women in the church were greatly moved, and here and there sobs could be heard as the strange scene worked upon the feelings of the audience.

The men wore badges, with numbers, and their names were not disclosed. "No. 10" was called first. He had been out of work for eight monhts, and had several people dependent upon him for support. Up jumped a man in the audience, and offered the man a position at $10, with three loaves of bread, a week to drive a baker's cart, near Coney Island. Several more were taken for paid positions, others were provided with food and shelter until work could be procured for them. One was taken as coachman for a private family, another was given a job as house-painter in New Jersey, another was given a place by the baker who took the first man.

A number of people gave $5 each toward helping the men who had not received positions. The auctioneer said, as the audience left the church, that they had accomplished their purpose, and that was to prove that the number of people who were out of work and in distress was much greater than the public imagined, and that "it was now up to the public to do something to take care of men who wanted to work, but could not."

Studies in Sight-Singing

LETTERS reach us from time to time referring to the Sight-Singing Lessons under the leadership of Mme. Newman, which proved so acceptable at the time of their introduction. Many could not avail themselves at the time of this opportunity to obtain a musical education under attractive conditions and at a nominal cost.

Mme. Newman's course in sight-singing is designed to inspire the student of vocal music to self-culture. It presents, in simple form, the theory of music and places clearly and concisely before the pupil just what is needed. Many new and valuable features have been added to the course since its introduction to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers several years ago. The whole series of lessons is in touch with the leading modern methods, and admirably adapted to the needs of the tutorless student of either sex. The whole course constitutes a system which will not only produce perfect sight readers, but will enable the students to develop and cultivate the artistic "singing voice" and a definite, practical method.

Over 2,700 American students, and many in foreign lands, have already taken this course. Hundreds write in commendation of the method of instruction. Those desiring to learn further details concerning the course, terms, etc., may address Mme. Newman, Box 184, Brooklyn, N. Y.; or to the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Where Children Play on the Roof

ONE of the most interesting outposts for Christian work among the foreigners of New York City is the Helen F. Clark Mission, formerly the New York Foreigners' Mission, but now bearing, by vote of the trustees, the name of its energetic and courageous founder. Miss Clark's mission is in the heart of the foreign district, at the point where the Chinese and Italians predominate. She has been especially successful in reaching the children. Miss Clark gives an interesting account of some phases of her work. She says:

"The pupils and workers of the mission unite in thanking THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the gift which recently came to us through the generosity of its readers. We appreciated the $50 more than words can tell. There was a shout of joy and thanksgiving sent up when we saw it. It came opportunely, as we have recently taken a house at 195 Worth Street, fitting the four upper stories and roof for our work.

"It is a small house, with a queer angle in front, where the cutting through of the street, years ago, took off a triangular slice from the face of the buildings. In this house we have two missions, and living rooms for our missionaries, and, best of all, in the children's eyes, a playground on the roof. The only drawback is that it ought to be five times as large.

"Splendid times our little Chinese and Italians have on the roof. Only a city boy, with no woods or fields in which to run wild, can ever know the pleasure of such a playground.

"A week ago, twelve of our Chinese lads raised their hands, thus showing that they fully meant to be Christians. At the same time one little Jewish and an Italian girl also gave their hearts to Jesus.

"Our mission has another line of work—caring for the sick and the poor. Through us many of the sick are placed in hospitals. Sometimes the hospitals are full; then we must care for them ourselves. Just now we have a little baby in the mission. Her mother was in our mission many years, and was loved for her bright, cheery spirit. When she passed to her heavenly home, we said, 'What shall we do with the motherless baby?' She was a frail babe. The doctors told us that she would die in an institution; only home love and care would bring her through. We opened our hearts and home to this little one. To-day she is strong and well, the life and joy of the place.

"Two children whom we have had in our care have turned out especially well. One of these is Ah Foon, whom we rescued from a Chinese opium joint ten years ago. This little waif was rescued at great cost; for threats and attempts at violence were made against us. Our mission was stormed in the night, and they laid in wait for us. To-day the child is in college, studying to be a missionary.

"The other child to which we referred is Constantini di Tomaso, an Italian lad, now sixteen years old. He came into our mission about five years ago, when he was a little bootblack. He became a Christian, but suffered much persecution. At last, one night, when he had been terribly beaten, he came to us with his little body stained with blood. We took him and sent him to school. He learned to love his Bible, and has become a teacher in our Sunday School.

"This spring, when in Italy, he called his relatives together and taught the Bible. One after another believed the blessed message of grace. The night before he returned to America, there was held an all-night meeting; Constantini preached to fifty-two people, all of whom came to know Jesus as a loving Saviour.

"The house into which we have moved is old and dirty. Many changes have to be made to fit it for our work. Often we do not know from whence our next meal shall come. We do know that 'God is faithful,' and in some way, but often through suffering and testing, help will come."

Children of Many Races at the Clark Mission

FOLLOWING JESUS

FOLLOWING JESUS, let us be found always,
Seeking to rescue some lost one astray;
From sin and temptation win back the wand'rer
And point him to Jesus, the Truth and the Way.

Following Jesus to care for the needy,
Lighten the darkness of mis'ry and gloom,
Lifting the burden from shoulders so weary,
Making the desert with roses to bloom.

Following Jesus to comfort the mourner,
Bind up the heart that is broken and torn,
Wipe away gently the tear that is falling,
Scatt'ring night-shadows with beams of the morn.

Following Jesus, though often the pathway
With thorns is bestrewed, yet if He is near,
We'll faint not, nor weary, but onward pursuing,
March on to victory with never a fear.

It is absolutely safe—it does not come in direct contact with the eyes; and five minutes' manipulation, in your own home, twice a day, is all that is necessary to counteract eyestrain and headache, and relegate eyeglasses to the rubbish box. Various Views on Taft's Opportunity sentiment of the communities to be served. On President Taft's policy as regards the selection of men chosen for administrative duties in the South depends more than anything else the attitude of the South toward the federal government. If Mr. Taft materializes his pledge in this respect, he will have done more toward genuinely reuniting the country than has been done by any President since the war.

Herbert Howe Bancroft, historian, Concord, Calif.: The one paramount hope of all good citizens from the incoming of President Taft is the moral regeneration of the republic, so happily begun by President Roosevelt, and the effects of which are seen already in every State and city of the Union, and abroad throughout Christendom. Surely no greater work than this was ever vouchsafed a ruler of any age or nation.

Arthur Gilman, author and educator, Cambridge, Mass., First Regent of Ratcliffe College: If Mr. Taft can continue the efforts of Mr. Roosevelt to promote peace among the nations and to establish the Golden Rule as the principle to direct our nation in dealing with others, he can perform no more important task.

FAITH AND FAITHFULNESS*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

SO the Church throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria had peace" (verse 31). Because Saul, the greatest of inquisitors, had himself become a follower of the Lord Jesus (Acts 9:1-19). "Being edified" because they walked in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit.

He leads us on, by paths we did not know.
Upward he leads us, though our steps be slow,
Though oft we faint and falter on our way,
Though storms and darkness oft obscure the day,
Yet when the clouds are gone
We know he leads us on.

He leads us on through all the unquiet years;
Past all our dreamland hopes, and doubts and fears
He guides our steps. Through all the tangled maze
Of sin, of sorrow, and o'erclouded days
We know his will is done;
And still he leads us on.—ANON.

"Peter went throughout all parts" (verse 32) on an apostolic mission. But how did there happen to be saints at Lydda, one of the places visited by Peter? Let us remember that after Philip had preached the Gospel to the treasurer of Candace he was spirited to Azotus; afterward he preached the Gospel in all the cities until he came to Cæsarea, and Lydda lay between Azotus and Cæsarea. Undoubtedly Philip had founded a Christian church at Lydda. It has been said by Dr. Parker: "No names are given in verse 32. There is something better than a name. There is character. There you find no personal renown, no individuality running up into a flashing pinnacle, but you find a high level of character, a solid quality of moral and spiritual being, and supreme effective reality. It is toward that estate we should constantly be moving, to the great republic of common holiness." The "saints" in Lydda attracted Peter as by a magnet. In all the cities between Azotus and Cæsarea the saints were like magnets to Peter, drawing him there. Do Christians thus draw us? Do we seek out for our friends the followers of the Lord Jesus? Is our supreme delight found in such companionship?

The Meaning of Faith

"He found a certain man named Æneas" (verse 33). He was easily found, being known throughout all Lydda, because for eight years he had been bedridden by the palsy. Probably the friends of Æneas besought Peter to come to his house, hoping that he would heal him, knowing that in other places Peter had wrought miracles of healing. In the name of Jesus Christ Peter said, "Arise, and make thy bed." Nothing doubting, Æneas did as he was told. God's biddings are enablings. The bed of Æneas was probably a coverlet sewed together and stuffed with wool; there were no bedsteads in that land.

"If I only had more faith!" said a young and widowed mother, as she petted and caressed the child in her arms. "What do you understand by faith?" was asked. "A certain confidence in my own spiritual condition—a surety such as I hear others speak of," was quickly answered. "Your child has the faith that you need," was the reply. "How so?" asked the mother. "Your child trusts you, loves you, obeys you." "Oh, yes; pet clings to me; I'm all she has, you know," and a shower of tears rained over the baby's face.

"That's it!" exclaimed the aged Christian—"that is the faith that gives assurance—this trusting, clinging faith in Christ. He must be all love, to trust and to cling to."

It has been said that: Faith is the soul's ear. "Hear and your soul shall live." Faith is the soul's feet, so Christ has said, "Come unto me." Faith is the soul's eye. "Behold the Lamb of God." Faith is the soul's hand. "Who touched me?" (Mark 5:30.) Faith is the soul's lips. "My mouth shall show forth thy praise." Faith is the soul's palate. "If ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious." Faith is the soul's mouth. "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life."

Once a boy in Sunday School could not understand about faith. His teacher told him to come to his store next morning at ten o'clock, and get something he had there to give him. At just ten o'clock the boy came. "Why!" said his teacher, "what have you come for?" "You told me that you would give me something if I would come," replied the boy. "That is faith," said the teacher. "Jesus is more sure to keep his promises than I can be; can you not have faith in him?"

Trying to Be a Christian

Dr. George F. Pentecost tells of a young woman whom he asked, "Are you a Christian?" She replied, "I am trying to be one, sir." "But you are not to try, you are just to believe." "I know that quite well, sir; that is what Mr. Moody has been telling us in his sermon this afternoon. And that is what I am trying to do. I am trying to believe." "Well, what are you trying to believe?" "Why, sir, I am trying to believe that I am saved." "But you are not to turn your faith upon yourself at all. You are nowhere bidden in the Word to believe that you are saved. Do you not see that if you were to find something in or about yourself that you recognized as salvation, or the ground of it, you would not be trusting in Christ at all, but only in yourself? This is a very common mistake. We are constantly tempted to turn our thoughts inward upon ourselves, rather than outward to Christ, who alone can save." "Well, that is just what I am trying to do," she replied. "I am trying to believe in Christ." "But what are you trying to believe concerning him?" "I saw she had confused thoughts, so I determined upon a course of questions which I thought would lead her out of her darkness.

"'Do you believe that Jesus Christ came into the world some two thousand years ago? Do you believe that he was the Son of God? Do you believe that when God sent his Son into this world, he did really lay or cause our sins and iniquities to be laid on him? Do you believe that he bore your sins, as well as those of other sinners, or do you believe that you were left out of the account?' In each case she answered 'Yes.' 'If you believe these things, you are not trying to believe them, so you may give over trying and begin trusting.' 'Why, yes, sir; that seems very plain.' 'What is it about Christ you cannot believe?' She looked into my face thoughtfully and steadily, as though she were trying to think of something she did not believe, and as if she feared to give up her trying and trust him whom she did believe. In a moment she threw all her fears away, and, with a radiant face, said, 'Oh, now I see it; I am not to believe that I am saved, but that Jesus Christ saves me by what he has done for me.'"

Æneas knew at once that he was cured of the palsy. He did not need to feel of his limbs, or test his cure by trial steps. He trusted fully in the name and power of Jesus. And so did all of the people in Lydda, and those who dwelt in the region round about on the plain of Sharon (verse 35).

"At Joppa a certain disciple named Tabitha" (verse 36). There were also saints in Joppa, because Philip had preached there. Among them was a woman with such large and lustrous eyes that she was called the "Gazelle." Have you ever seen the eyes of a gazelle? The Greek people called her "Dorcas," and others called her "Tabitha," both meaning "gazelle." Those gazelle-like eyes were closed in death when Peter came into Joppa. Lydda was only about ten miles distant from Joppa, and two men had been sent there to entreat Peter to come, hoping that he might be able to raise Dorcas from the dead. The beautiful work which the beautiful eyes had done was seen by Peter as the widows and orphans stood around the bier of Dorcas, showing the garments which she had made for them.

"Tabitha, arise" (verse 40). Peter was alone with God and the dead woman when he spoke these words; for all persons had been sent out of the death chamber by him. First, Peter talked with God in prayer, that he might have power given him to bring the dead woman to life. And then he talked to the dead woman, saying "Tabitha, cumi." Jesus had once said, "Talitha, cumi," and a little dead girl had opened her eyes and was restored to health and to her parents. And Peter, in the name of Jesus, restored the "Gazelle" to the saints and to the widows and orphans. And because of the wonderful thing that had been done many believed on the Lord. It is touching to note how closely Peter followed Jesus in bringing the dead back to life—there was only one letter's difference. Jesus said "Talitha," Peter said "Tabitha."

John Ruskin has said: "You keep the Sabbath in imitation of God's rest. Do, by all manner of means, if you like, and keep also the rest of the week in imitation of God's work."

Peter was worthy to do the works of his Master. Are we worthy to do them?

Scipio Africanus, the great Roman general, was respected and beloved by the Roman people for his virtues and valor. He wore a signet ring, on which was engraven his own likeness, and this ring at his death passed into the possession of his son, who, so different from his father, was an abandoned and worthless fellow, a depraved and dissolute man. But the bad son would persist in wearing and flaunting everywhere his good father's ring and would even take it with him into his haunts of vice and dissipation. So the outraged Roman Senate passed a resolution forbidding the son of Scipio Africanus to wear his father's ring in the Senate House. With what the fellow chose to do outside the Senators could not interfere. It would seem reason enough to keep a son from vice that he dishonors his father; but, most of all, should he be deterred by the dishonor put thus upon his Father in heaven. Negative goodness is not enough. "Power to do good," a college officer wrote in an autograph book, "is the true and lawful end of all aspiring."

Charles Kingsley said: "Thank God every morning when you get up that you have something to do that day which must be done, whether you like it or not. Being forced to work, and forced to do your best, will breed in you temperance, self-control, diligence, strength of will, and a hundred virtues which the idle never know." A young lady once stood watching a potter. He had one foot on the treadle, in constant exercise, to keep his wheel going, while the other foot was still. "I should think your foot would get so tired," she said. "Oh, no," he said, "it isn't the one that's working that gets tired, but the one that's doing nothing."

The New Regime in Turkey

HON. THOMAS R. WALLACE, our Consul in Jerusalem—whose recent cablegram to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD announced the fact that one of the important incidents of the new constitutional régime in the Sultan's dominions was the admission of Jews generally on "Constitution Day" to the sacred temple area, from which they had heretofore been rigidly excluded—sends the following letter, supplementary to his wire dispatch:

"AMERICAN CONSULATE,
"JERUSALEM, Jan. 4, 1909.

"CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York: In confirmation of our telegram sent to you December 23 last, I would say that all persons were admitted to the mosque, without escort, the day the proclamation was read in public, declaring the Constitution. As you may have noticed in the various reports concerning the way the subjects of the Sultan received the news of the proclamation, the spirit of tolerance seemed to be general with all.

"This spirit was displayed far more generously by the Moslems than by any other of the religious bodies in this vicinity. As an instance, the same rigid rules were enforced against the admission of the Jews to the holy places of the Christians as before. There was some friction because of this attitude, as the Jews understood the restrictions against them had been removed by Christian as well as Moslem. THOMAS R. WALLACE,
"American Consul."

A Vigorous Old Age

I want to give you a little history of an old couple, with whom I have lived for over sixty years. Mr. Truax is past ninety, and his wife is past eighty-seven. They have been over sixty-six years married, and have a little home of their own, but a very scant little bit of means, and yet she sends help to the Bowery Mission. We live on about $300 a year, we three, and out of that comes the taxes, etc. They have taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD nearly ever since it was first published, have always liked it and have been well pleased with the premiums. I am a sister of Mrs. Truax. They are almost the same as father and mother to me. I am also old—past seventy-three. We three do all the work of the household, in doors and out. We have lately had a fall of snow. Mr. T. is out opening the paths. He also gets in wood and coal, saws down trees from his lots and works them up into stove-length wood.

Hastings, Minn. MARY M. COUNTRYMAN.

THERE'S LIGHT

A SNOW rim on my brow,
But summer in my heart;
My feet are weary now,
Soon earth and I must part.
But God has made my pathway bright
And now at evening time there's light.

A staff of easy grasp Supports my yielding limb;
He bids my faith to clasp
Its hold and trust on Him;
His will and care are my delight,
And, lo! at evening time there's light.

Like winter suns that shine
E'en through the cloudy rifts,
His love and favor now are mine,
Rich in my Father's gifts.
I may not fear, there is no night,
Behold! at evening time there's light.

My outer vision's dim,
My inner eye is clear,
My every thought of Him
Disperses every fear.
I know life's outcome will be right,
For now at evening time there's light.

Some night or morn or noon,
Life's journey will be done;
Nor do I fear, if soon
My endless life's begun,
Then, O the bliss of that first sight,
When path and pillow flame with light.

Not All Silk Gloves Are Kaysers

Until three years ago, nearly every silk glove was a Kayser—with the patent double tip.

No other make was acceptable.

Every woman wanted the Kayser fabric, Kayser fit, and the Kayser finger tip.

The old-time silk gloves were ill-fitting and worthless. Very few women wore them.

It was only when Kayser created perfection that silk gloves became the summer gloves of the millions.

Why Inferior Gloves Were Worn

When the sudden craze for long gloves came, we could scarcely begin to meet it.

So other makers were called on, and all sorts of gloves were sold.

Even lace mitts and stocking tops, attached to short gloves, sold as fast as the makers could make them.

Any makeshift was welcome. Quality was forgotten. The cry was for any long glove.

Then millions of women, who could not get Kaysers, accepted inexperienced makes.

"The Kayser"

Patent Finger-Tipped Silk Gloves
A Guarantee in Every Pair

Now conditions have changed. We have immensely increased our capacity.

This spring you can all get Kayser gloves—any shade or style or length.

There is no need now to take inferior makes. You can get the gloves you want—the Kayser.

But there is need to be careful.

Now it is necessary to insist on the Kayser, and to see the name on the hem.

Then you are sure of the gloves which, for 25 years, have been found so satisfactory.

Not Easy to Make

A perfect silk glove isn't easy to make. That is why other makers fall short.

It requires years of experience, and infinite skill, to make a silk glove that will fit.

One must make his own silk, and dye it himself, to attain a durable fabric.

And our patent tips are essential.

Each Kayser glove goes through fifty operations before it becomes the perfect glove that you see.

Yet you pay no more for Kaysers than for gloves half as good. You have simply to see that you get them.

Long Silk Gloves, 75c and up

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Scientific and Practical Invention for Those Who Are Deaf or Partially Deaf—May Now be Tested in Your Own Home.

Deaf or partially deaf people may now make a month's trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This is unusually important news for the deaf, for by this plan the final selection of the one completely satisfactory hearing aid is made easy and inexpensive for everyone.

Mrs. C. Liberka, 238 12th Ave., Maywood, Ill., wears an Electrophone less conspicuous than eyeglasses.

This new invention (U. S. Patent No. 763,575) renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear, and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises, and also so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural, unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

Prominent Business Man's Opinion

STOLZ ELECTROPHONE CO., Chicago.—I am pleased to say that the Electrophone is very satisfactory. Being small in size and great in hearing qualities makes it PREFERABLE TO ANY I HAVE TRIED, and I believe I have tried all of them. I can recommend it to all persons who have defective hearing.—M. W. The Little Doctor

A New Serial Story Written for "The Christian Herald"

By AGNES LOWE ELLIS

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

George Hunter and Dudley Verner were college chums and are stopping at the country home of the former. George is introduced to Miss Danforth, daughter of Squire Danforth, who lives on the fine estate called "Paradise." A village character, Jack Green, takes them to see "Paradise." They there meet Miss Danforth, and Dudley is introduced. As they leave, the Squire drives by on the way home. His daughter is surprised at his sudden return. He says he is going abroad, and will take her and her aunt. They go to call on Mrs. Hunter and her niece, Miss Sanborn. The Squire discovers that Mrs. Hunter is an old friend. On his return he tells Aunt Phœbe a family secret, which greatly agitates her. Dudley Verner starts life as a doctor in a quiet neighborhood. The two friends save a little boy named Donald Fraser from being run over. Mrs. Fraser was George's aunt, who had run away to marry Captain Fraser. They lost track of her. George finds she has been badly treated and deserted. Mrs. Fraser discovers that her husband still lives and again disappears. Squire Danforth finds a friend in an insane asylum who has information which may lift, his daughter writes, a cloud from his life. George's mother proposes to go to Long Branch. Jack Green comes to George and informs him that Captain Fraser was looking for the Hunter family to find his wife. George has his mother and cousin prepare for an early start. Green drives Fraser to the Hunter home so slowly that he arrives too late. The Hunter party stops in New York. Captain Fraser finds them and demands to see Mrs. Hunter and his wife. He will not believe that the latter is not with them. George comes in and informs him he knows something about him which will put him in safe keeping for some time. The captain leaves. Mrs. Hunter is hurried to Long Branch. The young men out walking think they see Donald Fraser, but he disappears in the crowd. Verner tells George the story of his life; that he was adopted while Mr. Verner was traveling in Spain. George and Dudley rescue Donald from a kidnapper and George is hurt. Mrs. Fraser and Donald are brought to Mrs. Hunter. All return in the fall to Mrs. Hunter's home. Ellen improves in health. A letter is received from Marion saying they will return to New York and that they are going to Mexico, where her father is interested in a plantation. Dudley discovers Captain Fraser dying in a hospital. He is penitent, and Ellen is with him when he dies. Her condition becomes alarming. Squire Danforth and Marian return, and then go to Mexico. Donald goes to New York to try a cure for his lameness. Ellen tells her sister she does not expect to live.

THE necessity for helpful ministrations to another seemed to impart strength to Mrs. Hunter. She grew more bright and cheerful as the days went by, and she would not admit even to herself that the chariot wheels were on their way to bear a message of death to their home.

During all this time of solicitude and dread, Aunt Phœbe was a tower of strength.

Encouraging letters came often from George and Dudley, usually containing a little note from Donald. He was very happy in his new quarters. Once he wrote: "Every one is so kind to me, and brother Dudley (he says he wants me for a brother, because he has none of his own) is doing me a great deal of good. What the doctors did hurt me a little, but now I am very comfortable. Dear mamma, hurry and get well, and come on here to stay a while. Dudley is going to take me out now every day to ride, and I will see so much that is wonderful, that I want you to see everything, too; won't you come?"

Ellen wept much over this letter, and in reply wrote:

"My Darling:

"Your sweet letter was a great comfort to me. I am glad I taught you to write. I shall keep these dear letters always.

"Mamma is so glad her darling child is better; glad to know he will be able, by and by, to run and play like other boys and to enjoy long walks in the beautiful grounds around your new home.

"Tell brother Dudley I do thank him for his loving, tender care of you, and that I shall write to him soon.

"I am tired now, dear, and must lie down. Your loving "Mother."

The next day she wrote to Dudley:

"Dr. Verner:

"Donald calls you 'brother Dudley,' and my heart goes out in gratitude to you for the love that prompted you to offer yourself as a brother to the child who will soon be motherless.

"I want to ask you, if it be possible to do so, to bring Donald home to me soon. There is no denying the fact, which I think will be apparent to you when you come, that my days are numbered.

"I have failed much since I saw you last, but the little rebellion at the thought of leaving my boy alone in the world is all gone. Sister Dora will be a mother to him, and all of you, I am sure, will tenderly cherish the little orphan. I am at peace and content. What more can I ask?

"And now, say to George, that I have not strength left to write more or I would not neglect him. Give him my love, and ask him to come with you and Donald to see me. Make haste, please.

"Sincerely yours,

"Ellen Fraser."

George and Dudley, with little Donald, started at once upon the receipt of this letter. There was no mistaking the desperate earnestness of those words. Donald was much improved, but was still unable to walk without his crutch. In lieu of this, Dudley's arms conveyed him here and there; but soon he would, they hoped, be able to walk alone and unsupported.

They found Mrs. Fraser startlingly changed; but Donald seemed not to notice her pallor and emaciation. To him she was just his own dear mamma, having the same gentle, loving smile as ever and the same tender clasp of the hand and loving words for him.

However much she might grieve and weep in secret, she had nothing but cheerfulness for the child.

"Donald," she said, "if mamma should have to leave you some day, to go on a long journey, would you be willing to stay with auntie or brother Dudley and George, and let me go?"

"Yes, mamma, if you wanted me to stay."

She drew him quickly toward her and imprinted kiss after kiss upon his face, as she said, "Go to bed now, darling. You need sleep, and mamma is tired."

"Good night, mamma!"

"Good night, darling!"

During a long talk with George and Dudley, that same evening, Mrs. Fraser told them of her firm conviction that life's journey was almost over, and Dudley was obliged to admit that she had undergone a great change for the worse since his last visit.

She asked the privilege of leaving her child in their joint care, saying, "I want but your promise to accept the trust, and I shall die contented. In the event of any of his father's family ever coming to claim him, I want George to have affairs so arranged that they cannot lawfully take him from you. Will you humor a sick woman's whim, by drawing up a paper to-night, in legal form, constituting both of you his guardians, and I will sign it? This may seem a strange arrangement, but you can decide between you where his home shall be. I trust you both, equally and implicitly, and believe that he will grow up under your guidance, if his life is spared, to be an honest, upright man."

While George went to prepare the paper, Dudley talked soothingly to her and assured her that he would find only delight in caring for the dear boy, who had already won his heart and of whose ultimate cure he now had not the slightest doubt.

Mrs. Hunter and Lily came in, and bore witness to the signature affixed by Ellen's trembling hand. She thanked them all warmly, and, with a kind good night, they left her to the care of Lily.

George and Dudley were sitting in the library, conversing about the peculiar circumstances which led them to Ellen's home, and of her strange desire to have the paper drawn up at once, when Lily hurriedly summoned them.

She reported that the invalid had been tossing restlessly, breathing with difficulty, and that she had paid no heed to her inquiries, but had simply gazed at her speechlessly.

The young men both followed her hastily, and, as Dudley drew near the bedside, he whispered to George, "Take Lily away."

He felt Ellen's pulse and listened for her heart-beat, but the tired heart was still.

The beautiful eyes were wide open, and the lips slightly parted, while a smile hovered around them.

He gently closed the eyes and folded the tired hands, saying, "Sleep on now, and take your rest." Then he went to tell the sad news to the watchers in the other room.

CHAPTER XVI

THE shock was very great to all the family, but especially so to Mrs. Hunter.

Donald could hardly be comforted for his great loss, but when he was made to understand the arrangements of his mother in regard to his future, he tried to bear his bereavement silently.

"The child is too still—he must have some change, George," said Dudley, "Suppose you take him over to Aunt Phœbe. I will answer for his being a welcome guest."

So Donald was taken over to visit to New York. The old lady was delighted to have the little fellow with her, and exerted herself in every way Aunt Phœbe until he should go back to make him comfortable.

She told him over and over again the stories of her early days, of which he never grew weary. She fed him with nourishing food, and spared no pains in preparing many dainty dishes for his use, saying that proper food was as necessary as medicine for a delicate child.

The day before the little party were to return to New York, a long letter was received from the travelers, which gave much pleasure to both homes, though one of the number for whom it was meant, and who would have greatly enjoyed it, was not there.

Aunt Phœbe and Donald had come over to be in readiness for an early start on the following morning. The whole party gathered in the library while Lily read aloud the epistle, which was from Marian and bore the date of Campeche, Yucatan.

Marian told of their voyage first to Havana, and then of their arrival in Vera Cruz, and described the old walled city, with its Spanish forts, quaint churches and ornate cathedral. They stopped at the home of a friend, whose house reminded them of some old-time castle rather than a modern dwelling. She concluded with a brief outline of their plans.

For a time after the reading of this letter, Dudley sat lost in thought. Then he said, "A part of that letter came to me like a long forgotten scene in my past life, and I can hardly divest myself of the thought that I have visited some of those places. Of course I have not—it must be all imagination."

A long and earnest conversation followed and the family, one and all, united in wishing the troublesome "business," whatever it might be, were over, and their friends safe at home again.

The next day they made an early start and arrived in due time in New York. The parting with Donald was very hard for all the home circle, and poor old Elsie held him in a long and loving embrace, releasing him at last, as she said with tear-dimmed eyes and faltering voice, "God bless and keep Miss Ellen's bairn."

The two households, after the departure of the three so dear and sorely missed, settled down into a quiet which seemed at times almost unbearable. At last, Mrs. Hunter sent for Aunt Phoebe, telling her to come over for a week or two to relieve their loneliness. She complied at once and, seated in her favorite chair with her knitting, she told them many tales of by-gone years, and kept them so pleasantly occupied that for a time they almost forgot their great loss.

Dudley and George took up their daily work again in the city, both a little quieter and a little sadder, but with a will braced to overcome all obstacles. Donald's improvement was slow, but sure. His guardians strove by every means in their power to amuse and comfort the doubly bereaved child. Books and playthings in abundance were provided for him, but his greatest delight was to be taken to drive through the city and out to the park.

Once, while they were there, George thought that he caught sight, in a passing vehicle, of the boy who was the cause of Donald's accident on the day when they found him and his mother. He almost rejoiced now in the rudeness which had led to that day's discovery. Certainly he would have greeted the lad cordially, had he come their way. He passed on, however, at a distance and George said nothing to Dudley about the matter. Soon little Donald's eyes were sparkling and his face was glowing with pleasure at the scenes through which they were driving, and the young men were delighted.

"We shall have no trouble in keeping the child happy, George," said Dudley: "He seems to care more for our society than for all the children in the park."

"Yes, isn't it good, Dudley? Our work as guardians seems likely to be one of the pleasantest things in our whole lives."

The Glacial Age*

THE last stages of the ice invasion were of such recent date that man, including even civilized man, was a witness of the grand phenomena of the belted canopy. The demonstration of this point is very important, as its establishment admits before the court the evidence locked up in the mythological tales, the fossil thought of those ancient days, which has come down to us as an echo. It is generally admitted by the scientists that man lived on the earth during the Pleistocene. Further, it may be well to state that remnants of the belts probably survived in the heavens long after the ice disappeared.

The popular idea that the Ice age occurred at a very remote date, humanly speaking, lives on in spite of the fact that science has controverted the data on which it was originally founded. In one sense the age is not yet over; the glaciers, especially those of Alaska, are still receding. But this slow recession, while it shows that the date of heavy glaciation was recent, is of little value in the present connection, for it only demonstrates the tenacity with which cold stored up in the past has endured. It does not show that the cause itself still existed until recent time.

Prestwich places a rough estimate within the limits of 6,000 to 12,000 years as necessary for the wearing back along the coast-line of certain cliffs since the glacial submergence in the soft Cretaceous, Oolitic, and Liassic strata in the south of England. The evidence from weathering in America confirms this. T. C. Chamberlin, State Geologist of Wisconsin, says: "No sensible denudation had taken place there since glacial times."
